$20,000,000 annually in the transporting of mail matter; besides, it will do away with the thousands of overcharges and manipulations of schedules, and will insure to all patrons of the express a uniform and possibly a lower and reasonable rate. It will make the Post Office Department self-supporting and make 1-cent postage possible. Another matter that may well be considered in this connection is the contention over the rate paid on second-class matter.

One contention is that the express companies should be prohibited by law from carrying second-class mail matter, and that would make up a part of the deficit. If it costs the Government, as estimated by the Postmaster General, 9 cents a pound to handle second-class matter, and it charges only 1 cent, for every dollar it receives it pays out $9, and is out $8 on every $9 transaction, hence we can not increase the net revenue of the department by increasing the second-class mail matter business. To the contrary, the greater the business the greater the deficit will be.

Another contention is that the rate on second-class mail matter should be increased to the rate which it actually costs the Government for handling second-class matter, which is estimated at 9 cents per pound, and that it would increase the revenue to the extent of $60,000,000. The present rate on secondclass mail matter is 1 cent per pound; yet with that low rate much of the second-class matter is now sent by express, much of it is carried at half a cent per pound-for instance, from Philadelphia to Kansas City, a distance of over 1,000 miles, the rate is 50 cents per 100 pounds. If the publishers can save money by shipping magazines and second-class matter by express with the present Government rate of I cent, are they likely to send their publications through the mail when we increase the rate to 4 or 9 cents per pound? If the express companies could carry second-class mail matter at half the rate that the Government does, or at one-eighteenth of what it actually costs the Government, can not the Government by taking over the express companies' business and contracts carry it at the same rate charged by express companies? If so, the bulk of second-class matter can be transferred to express cars and carried at express rates, which will insure not only a much lower transportation rate but equally as good and prompt service, as the express cars are hauled on the same train as are the mail cars. Special express trains run as fast as special mail trains do. Papers can be carried to and from the post offices by either the mail or express messengers and be distributed through the post office; hence the second-class matter can be dispatched and handled as promptly and satisfactorily to the publishers through the express cars as it is now handled. If so, why not make it possible for the Government to continue the present low rates of 1 cent per pound? The policy of Congress in the past has been to disseminate knowledge, not only by the distribution of public documents but by encouraging worthy and legitimate publications—the semiweeklies, the dallies, and other periodicals. It has given newspapers and magazines a rate of postage much below the actual cost of the service to the Government, certainly not with a view of making money but for the diffusion of knowledge and to promote education, happiness, and the welfare of our people. If by taking over the express business it will enable the Government not only to continue the present rate of second-class matter, and possibly to reduce it, but to give a 1-cent postage, and if it is the only way open to insure uniform and reasonable postal and express rates to all, it seems to me that it should be done.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit, the point I wish to make is that we ought not to reduce the compensation paid, but that if we do reduce it, we ought to do it because we know why we reduce it. We ought to know just exactly how much we ought to reduce it. in other words, jump at conclusions. We should not say that we will only pay a certain amount for a service for which we are now paying a great deal more money, unless we investigate the situation and are able as the result of that investigation to determine the justice of our action. I am in favor of getting the work done at the lowest possible price, but in doing that I am in favor of doing justice to the people with whom the Government has contracts.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this matter has been investigated a number of times. A number of commissions have been appointed, and they have investigated the matter and reported it to the House.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HAUGEN. I do. Mr. CULLOP. I want to call the attention of the committee business methods, but it will save the Government more than I to the fact that this question has been ruled on once before, and ruled on favorably to the amendment now offered. It is found in the Parliamentary Manual of the House at page 409:

An amendment reducing the amount appropriated for rallroad transportation of mails, coupled with a proviso directing the Postmaster General to reduce 10 per cent the annual compensation for transportation of mails on rallroads, was held to be in order as within the exceptions to the rule.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in order that we may go on I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I renew the point of order.
Mr. CULLOP. That was under the Holman rule, and it cites Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, page 3891, so that the question there seems to have been squarely decided by the Chair in favor of the contention now made. As the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa now is practically the same as the question presented there, it seems that ruling is conclusive.

Now, as to the advisability of the amendment, it seems to me no gentleman on this floor ought to question that this Government is paying these railroads not only too much, but outra-geously so. These amounts now paid are unreasonably high and ought to be reduced. No person here ought to question that, and this amendment comes squarely under the exception of what is known as the Holman rule, and it is certainly in order under the precedent that I have offered here. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is not necessary for me to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the precedent cited by my friend from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] has no application to the pending amendment. I invoked the same precedent the other day when an amendment was pending, and the Chair ruled it in order. This is an entirely different amendment, and it is not in order under the precedent cited.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not the law referred to in the proposition offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], but, so far as advised, the Chair is inclined to sustain the point of order on that portion of the rule which provides

That it shall be in order to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law or the House members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The Chair thinks the amendment is subject to a point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. That can not be done. That has just been done, and it is too late to strike out the last word.

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask unanimous consent, then, to address the committee for five minutes on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman come in under the next paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Railway Mail Service: For 14 division superintendents, at $3,000 each; 4 assistant superintendents, at $2,200 each; 14 assistant division superintendents, at $2,000 each; 139 chief clerks, at $1,800 each; 295 clerks, class 6, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 1,536 clerks, class 5, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 635 clerks, class 5, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 2,889 clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 2,496 clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 6,644 clerks, class 3, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 2,727 clerks, class 2, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 500 clerks, class 1, at not exceeding $900 each; 600 clerks, class 1, at not exceeding $800 each; at n

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I see there is carried in this bill as section 7 reclassification of the railway mail clerks. It goes into effect at the beginning of the fiscal year covered by this bill.

Now, in this part of the bill you carry an appropriation for these clerks specificially. Is it not necessary to have some provision in the bill that will permit the use of this money, unless it is already in the bill, if the classification of section 7 be agreed to? I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee, so that he can answer.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The classification under section 7 does not conflict in any way with the proposition before the House, as I see it.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me it does.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Where? Mr. MANN. Is not this proposition the one that carries the appropriation for railway mail clerks?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And it is specifically provided how many clerks there shall be in each of these classes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes. Mr. MANN. But that will not be the situation after the 1st of July under section 7, putting into effect the new classification of railway mail clerks.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If there will be a readjustment of the pay, of course there will be a change of totals in the bill.

Mr. MANN. There is no change of totals in the bill at all. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There will be a change, if we pass that provision, or there will have to be an additional appropriation.

Mr. MANN. It may require an additional appropriation, but the additional appropriation is not in the bill, and has nothing to do with the question of totals. You do not provide in section 7 the number of different clerks in each grade; but in the item which has just been read, you do provide the number in each grade at each salary. That number will be varied when the reclassification goes into effect, and the appropriation for the number of clerks specified in the item just read should be made available for use under the reclassification. Otherwise you will have a law providing for clerks but no money with which to pay them.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. What is the date of the going into effect of this section?

Mr. MANN. Section 7 says that after June 30, 1912—Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It should be 1913.

Mr. MANN. I am reading the bill as it reads: "After June 30, 1912."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am reading the bill: "After June 30, 1913." I read from page 33.

Mr. FOSTER. There is just a year's difference between the two gentlemen.

Mr. MANN. That is another proposition. That is not the reclassification. That is in reference to promotions. I am reading the provision of the bill which reclassifies these clerks.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. What page?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think there is a mistake in the gentleman's print. It ought to be 1913 instead of 1912.

Mr. MANN. I am inclined to think the purpose was to have the reclassification begin with the next fiscal year, but the money ought to be available for the reclassification. I call it money ought to be available for the reclassification. I call it to the attention of the committee, who will undoubtedly take care of it in some shape.

Mr. MURDOCK. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that that date left the committee different from what it is now. My impression is it has been changed since it left the committee.

Mr. MANN. I think not. This is the question of promotions.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understand. Mr. MANN. The provision of section 7, as to promotions, begins with June 30, 1913. Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But the reclassification commences with the first of the next fiscal year.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It can not take effect until 1913. under this bill.

Mr. MANN. It says the reclassification shall take effect.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But the practical effect of it will not be until 1913.

Mr. MANN. It would not take effect if there was no money to pay the clerks, but I think the intention was to make it take effect.

Mr. MADDEN. It was the understanding of the committee that it would not take effect until 1913.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It was not the purpose to make it effective until June 30, 1913.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the fact about this is that while a change in the classification of the railway mail clerks is provided here, that classification, so far as the salaries received and the promotion to which they are entitled, will not take place until June 30, 1913.

Mr. MADDEN. That was understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that paragraph.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I concede that the point of order is well taken.

For substitutes for clerks on vacation, $72,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to line 14, which we have just passed, for the purpose of offering an amendment which I think the chairman will favor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to return to line 14, page 20.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the amendment reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after the word." clerks," in line 14, page 20, the words "acting railway postal clerks and substitute railway postal clerks."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to line 14?

There was no objection.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For acting clerks in place of clerks or substitutes injured while on duty, who shall be granted leave of absence with full pay during the period of disability, but not exceeding one year, then at the rate of 50 per cent of the clerk's annual salary for the period of disability exceeding one year, but not exceeding 12 months additional, and to enable the Postmaster General to pay the sum of $2,000, which shall be exempt from payment of debts of the deceased, to the legal representatives of any rallway postal clerk or substitute rallway postal clerk who shall be killed while on duty or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as the result of such injury, $120,000.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 6, page 21, by inserting after the words "postal clerk" the words "or employee of the sea post service."

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment in view of the fact-

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is too late; the gentleman from Connecticut had begun to address the Chair.

Mr. REHLLY. Mr. Chairman, I will state that my object in Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I will state that my object in offering that amendment is to include in this law the heirs of clerks in the sea post service. By the sinking of the Titanic three employees of the Post Office Department who were engaged on that ship lost their lives. They were William M. Gwinn, of New York; Oscar W. Woody, of North Carolina, and John S. March, of New York. I feel that it is but just and fair that men employed in the postal service who risk their lives on a ship should be put in the same category as the railway mail a ship should be put in the same category as the railway mail clerks, and that their families should receive the benefits of this provision. That is the object of the amendment. One of these men, Mr. Gwinn, was not due to sail on the Titanic. He made a transfer that he might be back in New York to be present when an operation was to be performed on his wife. That love and devotion cost him his life.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's amendment says "employee of the sea post service." Would not the gentleman be willing to make it read "sea post clerk," so that they will know exactly what is meant?

Mr. REILLY. That would be acceptable to me.
Mr. MANN. If the gentleman would use the language "sea post clerk or substitute sea post clerk"—

Mr. REILLY. That is also agreeable, Mr. MANN. I think there might be some question about the language of the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the amendment suggested by the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Add after the word "postal clerk," line 6, page 21, the words "sea post clerk or substitute sea post clerk."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, line 6, after the words "postal clerk," insert the words "sea post clerk or substitute sea post clerk."

Mr. COOPER. I suggest that to make the amendment read properly you should strike out the word "or" after the first word "clerk" in the same line.

Mr. REILLY. That should be done to make it read properly. Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I did not catch the reading of the gentleman's amendment. He does not undertake to appropriate any money for the payment to the heirs of these men who lost their lives on the Titanic, but this is merely for the future?

Mr. REILLY. If this law is passed, hereafter the heirs of railway mail clerks who lose their lives will get $2,000. in passing this law I thought that we should include mail clerks on the regular seagoing vessels. We are making no specific appropriation now for these particular clerks, but are putting them under the general law which we hope will pass.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Connecticut, as he is a member of the Committee on the the propriety of increasing the amount to be allowed in cases of this character?

Mr. REILLY. The committee has considered it.

Mr. KENDALL. And in the judgment of the committee $2,000 is the maximum that ought to be provided?

Mr. REILLY. That was the judgment of the committee. Mr. MANN. I want to call the attention of the gentleman Mr. MANN. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that it was $1,000 a few years ago, and I offered an amendment to make it $2,000.

Mr. KENDALL. I know it, but I thought it might be further increased, and I was in hopes that the committee might have favorably considered it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, why should not the amendment relate also to the first line of that paragraph? Why should not they have the same relief? They are acting clerks in place of clerks or substitutes. Why not make it apply to sea post clerks there just the same as in the latter part of the paragraph?

Mr. REILLY. I should think it should.
Mr. STERLING. It seems to me so.
Mr. REILLY. And I think the word "clerks" covers that.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment as modified be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 6, after the word "clerk," at the beginning of the line, strike out the word "of" and insert after the words "postal clerks" the words "sea post clerk or substitute sea post clerk."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This provision as it now is liberalizes the existing law in that it gives an allowance to men who are injured in the service for a period of one year equivalent to their salary, and for a period of an additional year up to 50 per cent of such salary. This is a new provision in the law, as I understand it. I am fully in accord with this action of the committee and believe that we can not deal too generously with this most worthy class of Government employees. In my opinion they are in as hazardous employment as any Government employees, not excluding the members of the Army and the Navy. I have had several cases come to my attention lately where men in the Railway Mail Service have been disabled while in the service and in line of duty, who were required to hand in their resignations because they could no longer perform the duties of railway mail clerks. They were therefore left without employment, disabled so that they could not earn a livelihood by manual labor. In my opinion the Government owes to these injured railway mail clerks a still further duty, and I would make the suggestion—I can not offer it as an amendment, because it would be subject to a point of order—that legislation be offered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to make such injured railway mail clerks eligible to appointment in some other position in the Post Office Department to which they are fitted mentally and physically. It seems to me that is the least duty that we could perform for this worthy class of clerks.

Mr. MADDEN. As I understand it, the statement of the Second Assistant Postmaster General to the committee was to the effect that where men were injured in the service and they were capable of doing any kind of work at all they were always provided for in some place that would give them a livelihood.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand statements of two railway mail clerks, one, Mr. C. L. Hughes, who was in-jured in three separate railway wrecks. After the last injury he was given a position as transfer clerk in Nashville, Tenn. The position was abolished, and he was left without employment. I have in mind another case, that of N. W. Borden, who was in two railroad wrecks, in the last of which his spine was injured, so that to-day he has to use a cane and a crutch. His resignation was requested, and he to-day is out of the service. I do not complain as to this action on the part of the department, because they are seeking to fill these positions with men who can do a day's work, but it seems to me that we should give more power or discretion to the department to aid men of this character who are injured in the line of duty.

Mr. NYE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly, Mr. NYE. This provision does not cover men who are weighing mails periodically for the Government, does it?

Mr. ESCH. I should think not. Mr. NYE. Why should it not? I have in mind two or three Post Office and Post Roads, if the committee has considered instances of men who were weighing during these periodical weighings where they were injured. One man was heroic in saving the property of the Government and received serious injury. Why should not this provision cover men in the employ of the Government in weighing mail? They are not clerks, under the ruling of the department.

Mr. ESCH. They are temporary employees.
Mr. NYE. They are temporary employees.
Mr. ESCH. As I have already stated, the Railway Mail Service is one of the most hazardous under the Government. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, 24 clerks and 3 mail weighers were killed, 92 clerks seriously and 617 slightly in-During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, 12 clerks jured. were killed, 78 seriously and 439 slightly injured. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, there were 313 railroad accidents in which postal clerks were either killed or injured.

As a result of this large number of casualties in the service, the Second Assistant Postmaster General recommended, in his last annual report, legislation which would authorize the Postmaster General, in a case where a clerk is so seriously injured in line of duty as to render him unable to perform work, after the expiration of one year from receipt of injury, to grant a further leave of absence with pay equal to 50 per cent of his regular salary, which extension is not to exceed 12 additional months. It will be noted that this recommendation of the department has been carried out in the above provision of the pending Post Office appropriation bill, but as even this increase of compensation is not considered sufficient, the further recommendation is made for retirement of disabled clerks.

If a civil pension list is to be established in the United States I know of no better place to begin than with the Railway Mail Service. Retirement has already been provided for the Army and the Navy and for the Revenue-Cutter Service, and the reasons which persuaded Congress to make such provision obtain with equal force with reference to the Railway Mail Service.

The work in this service is exhausting and the strain on many routes is nerve racking. The mail cars are, as a rule, placed immediately next behind the locomotive, so that in case of collision the mail car is the first to receive the impact. Attending to their duties within the car, with no opportunity to protect themselves, surrounded by racks, sorting tables, and heavy mail sacks, serious injury and often death is an almost necessary result of a collision.

The dangers of this Government occupation have been so apparent and have so impressed Congress that legislation has already been enacted and further legislation is sought in this pending bill to still further promote the safety of these employees by providing for the gradual abolition of the wooden mail cars and substituting therefor cars constructed of steel. Some of the most frightful accidents in this service during the last decade have resulted from the telescoping and burning up of the wooden mail car. The new steel cars now being provided under the regulations and specifications of the Post Office Department will promote safety and prevent injury and loss of life from telescoping and fire, and the good results already attained, as shown in the reduction of casualties within the last two years, warrant the conclusion that when all steel railway post-office cars have been installed loss and danger will be reduced to a minimum.

But with the best of appliances and greatest care, casualties will continue to occur, and in the absence of a retirement law applicable to railway mail clerks, the question arises whether something more can not and ought not to be done by Congress in behalf of these most worthy and faithful servants of the Government.

I am pleased to note that there has just been reported out of the House Committee on the Judiciary the Howland bill, which seeks to extend the provisions and the benefits of the bill providing for the compensation of railroad employees engaged on interstate carriers, as recommended by the Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Commission, to clerks in the Railway Mail Service and to other civilian employees of the Gov-

Should the Howland bill become a law, compensation at different percentages of the monthly wages of the deceased would be paid to the widow and dependent child or children under 16 years of age over a period of eight years from date of death, but should the employee be injured and survive, the percentage of his monthly wages paid to him would vary with the extent of his injury and degree of incapacitation. I sincerely hope that this bill will pass, not only because of the benefits it confers upon men employed in the Railway Mail Service, but upon other civilian employees of the Government. If Congress believes it necessary and wise to require the interstate carriers of the country to provide for compensation for their employees, it ought to be equally necessary and wise to make like compensation for its own employees.

In the event that no action be taken on legislation providing for such compensation, I believe that the department ought to be given authority by law to provide for the employment in other branches of the postal service of all railway mail clerks who have received such injuries in the line of duty as to unfit them for further duty as such clerks, so that after the two years from date of injury, during which full and half pay is granted them, have elapsed, instead of being discharged from the service they may be retained and given a chance to earn a livelihood.

I have every reason to believe that the department is desirous of retaining such injured clerks by giving them such employment as their physical condition permits them to perform, but I would go further and favor legislation which would make such injured clerks eligible for appointment under the civil service to such positions as they could fill. As assistant postmasters have now been placed under the civil service, injured railway mail clerks should be made eligible to such appointments. The knowledge and experience they have gained of postal affairs in the Railway Mail Service would fit them to occupy such positions. They might also be made eligible for appointment in many instances as postal clerks. As such appointments in the larger offices are not confined to applicants residing in the city where the post office is located, there ought to be no prejudice and no objection to the appointment as assistant postmasters of injured railway mail clerks who are nonresidents, provided only that they are residents of the State in which such post office is located.

As proof of the hardship suffered by railway mail clerks who have been injured in the service and incapacitated from further continuing as such clerks, I wish to append as part of these remarks a letter from Mr. N. W. Borden, a resident of this city, giving his suggestions as to what he considered as appropriate relief and his statement of service, and also a statement of Mr. C. L. Hughes, an ex-clerk, who was also injured in the service:

1202 C STREET NE., Washington, D. C., March 5, 1912.

Hon. JOHN J. ESCH, Washington, D. C.

Hon. John J. Esch.

Washington, D. C.

My Dean Sir: Yours of the 20th last, concerning certain proposed legislation for the benefit of hiphred railway mail clerks, to hand. Am glad to know that you are a friend of the Railway Mail Service clerks and that you are in a position to appreciate to such a large extent the peculiar conditions in this branch of the service, and that you so willingly offer your services to bring about such legislation that will benefit clerks who are or who may be injured.

Yes; I think that it is imperative that some law be passed that will provide a means of protection for injured Railway Mail Service clerks, and I hope that you will believe that I am not saying this purely through selfish motives. As I am out of the service now, I am quite willing that my case be exploited and used as an example, if by so doing it will help to secure the legislation that is needed, and thereby a continuous selfish motives. As I am out of the service now, I am quite willing its will help to secure the legislation that is needed, and thereby a legislation of this kind urgent because most clerks need assistance when injured, but because it is simply a matter of right and justice that the Government should, as an employer, give due and adequate consideration to the problem of taking care of those who are injured in its service. We all know that private concerns on every hand are meeting this problem in ways beneficial to the injured employee. Is there any sound reason why the Government should not do as much? The soldier is well taken care of in consideration of the fact that he has exposed himself to bodily danger while in the service of the Government. The Railway Mail Service clerk is in a more hazardous soldier is in danger only in times of war. But when the clerk suffers the loss of an arm or leg or other severe injuries he is given no civil-service preference, nor is he rettred on a pension and given a home that is maintained at the expense of his employer. On the other hand, he is politely told th expiration of one year from the date of his injuries, and at the rate of 65 per cent of his former salary.

Thanking you for the interest that you have manifested in this matter and hoping that you may be successful in securing the desired legislation, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

I am at your command if I can be of further service to you.

Appointed to the Railway Mail Service August 4, 1891, at the age of 21 years.

In July, 1893, severely injured in a collision with wild cars near Deray, Tenn. A severe wound received in left groin from an iron bar which was driven into it; also injured in back.

In May, 1902, was injured in a derailment at Oxmoor, Ala., caused by broken switch point. Mail car totally destroyed. Severe bruises and spine injury resulted.

In April, 1905, injured in a derailment at Lynnville, Tenn., caused by running into a flour mili. Mail car totally destroyed. Injuries resulted as follows: Left side of skull crushed, left arm and eye injured, neck driven full of spilnters, upper lip cut through. Unconscious for several days. Spine was so badly injured that a brace has to be worn for support; can walk but little and with great difficulty.

These injuries have caused locomotor ataxia, with the usual accompanying pain and suffering. Being unable for further road duty, was in March, 1906, reduced from class 5 to class 3, with a reduction in salary of $400 per annum, and assigned as transfer clerk, Tennessee Central Depot, Nashville, Tenn. This latter position has since been ordered abolished by the Inspection Division, and I am dropped after 15 years' service.

STATEMENT OF H. W. BORDEN, INJURED IN LINE OF DUTY.

I entered the Postal Service in the fall of 1901, and, with the exception of the time that I was compelled to lay off on account of injuries received in accidents while on duty, I have performed regular service.

The first serious accident that I was in occurred on February 14, 1903, at Ravensworth, Va. On account of injuries received in this accident I was compelled to lay off some five or six months. On May 30, 1910, at Sycamore, Va., I was again very seriously injured, from the effects of which I have not as yet fully recovered. In addition to many severe wounds and bruises, I sustained double sacro-iliac dislocation and injured hip, which has and is still causing me to use support in the way of crutch and cane while walking or standing. About 18 months after I met with this accident I was given notice by the department I would have to return to road duty, I was forced out of the service. I must say that rooting is rather bad when one is untrained and physically handleapped. As I was unconsclous at the time, I am unable to give you any detailed description of the accident or wrecked car. The car must have been of an inferior type, for all of the 10 clerks on duty were more or less injured, and I am told that the car was completely demolished.

Next to the importance of legislation to prevent, as far as possible, such disastrous accidents and resultant injuries, the question to provide at least partial relief for those who may suffer a similar fate in the future is decidedly important.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will allow me— The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a statement. I may say for the information of the gentleman from Wisconsin and members of the committee that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, while they had this bill under consideration, in the examination of the Second Assistant Postmaster General went fully into the question cited by the gentleman from Wisconsin, not as to these particular cases, but there was a statement of the Second Assistant Postmaster General to the committee that the department invariably provided places for men who were injured in the service, and it is the understanding of the committee that provision is always made; that the department not only has the power, but it exercises that power; and I assume that if these gentlemen who are referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin would have their cases called to the attention of the Post Office authorities some provision would be made for them, and I may say that every member of the committee on the Post Office and Post Roads would be glad to help intercede with the Post Office Department for them. If I thought, as a member of the committee, that the department had not the power and did not exercise the power it had, I would be one of the first men, and I think every man on the committee would be glad, to have some provision put in the bill requiring that provision should be made for such men as those referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Esch].

Mr. ESCH. What would the gentleman think of this suggestion, of permitting these men so injured in the service to be placed on an eligible register so they could be given some preference in the matter of appointment?

Mr. MADDEN. I wish they could. Mr. ESCH. And should not they in fact be made eligible to appointment as assistant postmasters, they now being under the civil service?

Mr. MADDEN. Or watchmen or anything. The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I agree cordially with what my colleague [Mr. in this bill does not go far enough. There ought to be a Federal employee compensation law which would, when necessary, take care of employees disabled in the public service for a much longer time than one or two years. Nor will the suggestions made by gentlemen as to the eligible list suffice to meet the injuries suffered by Government employees-especially postal clerks—in the discharge of their duties. postal clerk, like one I knew, to be injured in a railroad wreck, paralyzed from his hips down, of what avail would it be to him to have Congress provide that his name can be put on an eligible list? Eligible list for what? He is helpless. We need a compensation law which shall provide during their lives for Federal employees permanently injured while in discharge of Mr. NYE. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

NYE. I am glad to inform the gentleman that the Committee on the Judiciary already within the last week has reported a Government civil employees' bill, with a schedule of compensation copied from the Brantley employers' liability bill.

Mr. COOPER. I am pleased to hear that from my friend, the gentleman from Minnesota, and in connection with his statement I desire to say that a few days ago, in another legislative body, a distinguished gentleman said that he hoped the Government of the United States would enact a Federal employees' compensation law "within the next year or two." "Within the next year or two!" Those were his words. Why wait a year or two? Why wait at all?

The time to pass it is now. Germany has such a law. have the other civilized countries around the world, and it is the duty of Congress to enact one without delay. In my judgment, there is no more important measure that the Committee on Rules could by special rule bring to the attention of the House, with a demand for its immediate consideration, than would be a bill properly caring for the men and women injured while on duty in the employ of the Government of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.]

The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER. No class of employees are in more hazardous employment than are the postal clerks. As my colleague [Mr. Esch] has said, they run as great a risk as do the men in the Army or Navy; indeed they run more risk than does the average man who enlists either in the Army or the Navy.
Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman.—
Mr. COOPER. They face death every day——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. COOPER. Just one moment—and if a man be crippled for life in that service it does not become the Government to offer to him his pay for one year, with a proviso that in no event can he have pay for more than two years, though he be forever hopelessly disabled.

One of the things the Committee on Rules might well do without delay is to bring in the bill mentioned by my friend from Minnesota [Mr. Nye]—the Federal-employee compensation bill—with a rule calling for its prompt consideration. The House will pass it, send it to the Senate, and learn whether that body will delay its enactment into law for a year or two.

Mr. HOWLAND and Mr. FOWLER rose.

Mr. COOPER. I will yield first to the gentleman from Ohio

[Mr. Howland].

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I was about to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield to me to make a statement. In that connection I want to say to the gentleman that the Judiciary Committee, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NyE] has just said, has reported out a bill which, I think, complies in every respect with the position taken by the gentleman from Wisconsin. And I want to say in that connection that we have the assurance of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee that they propose to make application to the Committee on Rules for a special rule in order to bring this matter before the House for consideration in the immediate future.

Mr. COOPER. I am very glad, indeed, to hear the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Howland].

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that is more important than the compensation act which is in both bodies now? Mr. COOPER. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he would not by law provide for the un-ESCH] has said, but, in my judgment, the proposition embodied fortunate men in the Railway Mail Service whose arduous duties for long hours have caused them to lose their minds and

What are the hours, I will ask the gentleman?

Mr. FOWLER. Some of them work as long as 17 hours in succession. I propose to speak on this question before we get through with this bill.

It is a little difficult to answer that question Mr. COOPER. by yes or no. The relation of cause and effect is more difficult to establish-I am speaking of the alleged injury-when the claim is that employment has caused insanity than where, for example, a car wheel has run over a man's leg and cut it off.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Cooper] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] that it is pretty late in the day, and it is

I would suggest to the gentleman that I only want to get a little information from the chairman of the committee before we adjourn. I would like to have the attention of the chairman, if I may. Last year, in the hearings, there was included a statement made on the 17th of January, 1911, by the Second Assistant Postmaster General to the Postmaster General, certifying the number of men employed as railway postal clerks as 14,483. He also certified the number who worked five hours a day, those who worked from five and a half to six hours a day, those who worked from six hours to six and one-half hours a day, those who worked from six and one-half hours to seven hours, from seven hours to seven and one-half hours, from seven and one-half to eight hours, and from eight hours to eight and one-half hours, and nine hours, and also those working more than nine hours. I would like to know if there is any information in the hearings of the condition of the railway post-office clerks as to hours the clerks are now required to labor. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there is any information in respect to this matter?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not think the hours of labor were ever fully defined. There are about 16,500 laborers now.

Mr. GOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would be perfectly willing that information of this kind from the Second Assistant Postmaster General should be procured through his committee?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I would like any information he may see fit to give us. The gentleman can obtain that information, if he desires it, from the department. I have no objection to any accommodation to the gentleman in that the department make a detailed statement if he desires it.

Mr. GOOD. If a resolution requesting the information is introduced, the gentleman would not make any objection to its going to the department?

There is no use of doing that. Mr. MOON of Tennessee.

They will respond to any inquiries.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee. this bill as reported to the House carries an appropriation of nearly $260,000,000, the largest amount carried by any of the appropriation bills. Upon first glance and without thought it does not appear that the committee considered the plan of economy, yet economy was considered by the committee, and this bill in effect only makes a loan for the benefit of every inhabitant of the United States and its possessions.

The Post Office Department is the only department of the Government that has a return for the large appropriation, and on account of the increased amount of business this department is practically self-sustaining and within another year the re-ceipts will exceed the expenditure, and then we can look to the early passage of an act that will give to the people of the United States 1-cent postage on first-class matter.

I am heartily in favor of the bill as reported and gladly support same in its entirety.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of economy in every branch of this Government, and my votes will support this statement. When the Democrats caucused on the proposition of public buildings and battleships. I voted against both proposed bills. am informed that the Government is now nearly three years behind with the work that has been arranged for by previous appropriations for public buildings, and I did not see the necessity of appropriating about $16,000,000 for public buildings when that work could not be done for about three years, and during the intervening time circumstances might change to such an extent that an appropriation might be unwise. However, at the expiration of the three years the Treasury may be in a better condition than it is at this time for such an expenditure of the public funds.

My vote against the battleship proposition was cast on the same ground; the Government to-day is nearly two years behind with their contracts for battleships, the appropriation for same having been made during the two previous Congresses.

I would much rather favor an increased appropriation for the benefit of the mail service of the United States than for public buildings or battleships at this time. No branch of the Government comes as close to the people as does the Post Office Department. The difference is great between the appropriation provided for by this bill and the proposed one for public buildings and battleships. This appropriation is for the promotion of business and the general welfare of the whole country and the amount is returned to the Treasury. The construction of public buildings and battleships necessitates a constant expenditure of money, there is no return, and after a few years all that is left is remembrance

Mr. Chairman, the mail men are the ones who reach every home of our Union, and they should be favorably considered by the committee that makes provision for their salary. Office Committee has labored hard to provide legislation that will relieve the employees of the post office of the many burdens that they are forced to undergo. In some instances the employees of the post office in cities of the first and second class have been called to work at most any hour of the day or night. Under the Reilly bill the hours of labor are defined, and the employees can not be required to labor more than 8 hours in 10 of any 24. This bill also provides for the promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks and letter carriers of first-class offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, and for the promotion of clerks and carriers of second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade, giving to them the promotion they have so long deserved.

The eight-hour system is in vogue in almost every department of the Government and should be adopted in the Post Office Department and in every branch. The mail clerks are supposed to labor on that basis, and are also supposed to have allotted to them sufficient time for the purpose of preparation. This has not been allotted nor has the department defined the hours of labor and preparation. The mail clerks are required to study more than any other employees of the Government; their routes are constantly changing; they are required to keep posted as to new offices, the discontinuance of old offices, and the change of routes, especially when rural routes are established and old offices are discontinued, and in some cases the entire route of the mail is changed, and this makes it absolutely necessary for the mail clerk to keep in constant study. The department should define the hours allotted to him for the preparation and make it sufficiently ample. Mr. Chairman, this bill makes provision for a reclassification for the Railway Mail Service; it carries with it additional grades; these are the men who work in the most hazardous place of all the Government employees, and are certainly entitled to the promotions that are provided for in this reclassification. There should not be a dissenting vote to this provision, and if any Member of the There should not be House is in doubt, he should lose no time in riding for a distance in one of the large mail cars and inform himself of the danger and hard work that is the lot of the mail clerk. I avail myself of the opportunity of riding in the mail cars frequently, and every time I am enlightened and realize the danger that confronts these noble men, and am more convinced that the reclassification and promotion that is provided for in this bill is more than justified.

This bill makes provision for a parcel post to begin on rural routes and intermediate points on these routes. This is the first step toward raising the limit of weight on packages and parcels up to and including 11 pounds that can be sent through All of the membership of this House, I dare say, the mails. has received many petitions for the parcel post, and I suppose many of us have received an equal number of protests against the inauguration of this system. It is my opinion that if the provision of this bill seeking to establish the parcel post on rural routes becomes a law that it will meet the universal satisfaction-the farmer, the rural citizen, the merchant will all be benefited. We have at this time in the rural district the telephone, and it reaches most every part of the country district. Most all of these telephones are so connected that any person living in the rural district can be connected with any merchant in his or adjoining county, and by the use of the telephone and rural routes the country citizen is practically living in the city so far as the convenience in having his goods delivered.

Some of us have received protests against the parcel post from the merchant that this is class legislation and discriminates against him and in favor of the large mall-order houses; but, on the contrary, this bill will work to his advantage, and I venture the opinion that within a year after this system is inaugurated the country merchant will be one of the greatest advocates of the parcel post in the United States.

When this bill becomes a law, the amount of fourth-class matter that will be handled by the star and rural carriers will be so immensely increased that it will be necessary to make provisions for an increased appropriation to compensate the star and rural carriers for the increased labor that will fall to their lot. This can easily be done without a drain upon the Treasury, as the department at present yields nearly a sufficient amount to meet the appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, all of us are familiar with what is known as the "gag rule"; the officers of the Government, the employees of every department are by this rule denied that right which is given them by the Constitution. Last year I introduced a bill in the House and it was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. This bill sought to regulate the orders of the executive department of the Government, and providedthat no executive department of the Government, and provided—that no executive department of the Government shall issue any order which denies any officer or employee of the United States of every description, serving in or under any of the executive departments of the Government, the right, either directly or indirectly, individually or through associations, to solicit an increase of salary or to influence or attempt to influence any legislation whatever, either before Congress or fits committees, and any order heretofore made to the contrary shall be null and void after the passage of this act.

This bill was for the purpose of placing all employees on the same footing with all American citizens and giving to these employees the right of free speech and petition-that which has been taken from them and denied to them by the orders which have been issued by the several departments and which has been more strictly enforced by the post-office authorities. Section 6 of this bill provides that no person in the classified service employed in the postal service shall be removed therefrom except for such cause as will promote the efficiency of the service and for reasons given in writing, and the person whose removal is sought shall have notice of same and of any charges preferred against him and be furnished with a copy thereof, and is also allowed a reasonable time for personally answering This bill also gives to the employees the right of membership in societies, associations, and clubs having for their object the improvement in the labor of its members, including the hours of labor, compensation, and leave of absence; it gives to them the right to present their grievances to Congress or any Member thereof, and should any employee avail himself of this opportunity it shall not be cause for a reduction in rank, compensation, or removal from the service. This provision simply places all employees on the same footing with all other American citizens, which should never have been otherwise, and restores to them the rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For actual and necessary expenses, division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, and railway postal clerks, while actually traveling on business of the Post Office Department and away from their several designated head-quarters, $60,000: Provided, That of this sum $15,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] that it is Saturday night, or soon will be,

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, well, Mr. Chairman, I know what the gentleman is going to say. [Laughter.] I will re-I move that the committee do now rise.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, April 21, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. NEELEY, as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou God and Father of us all, in whose changeless, boundless love we have our being, hold us close to Thee that we may feel the warm life-giving currents ever flowing out from Thee, that our faith, hope, and love may be strengthened.

We bless Thy holy name for the words which fell from the lips of the Master: "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you."

The sands of life run swiftly; we know not when the silver cord shall be loosed, the golden bowl broken. But so long as faith, hope, and love live, so long the immortality of the soul is assured.

I know not where His islands lift Their fronded palms in air; I only know I can not drift Beyond His love and care.

In this love our souls speed onward to the "Land of the Leal," where we shall dwell with our loved ones forever. Be where we shall dwell with our loved ones forever. this our comfort, the hope and comfort of the bereaved wife and children of the deceased Member in whose memory we are assembled, and pæans of praise we will ever give to Thee through Him who died that we might live. Amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MITCHELL.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and move its adoption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the reso-Iution.

House resolution 503.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL, late a Member of the House from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Senate.

Resolved. That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, if any other evidences were wanting to show the tragedies there are in life, that evidence could be supplied in the oft repeated meetings of this House to honor the memory of departed Members. Yesterday a Member was in his seat; to-day his desk is covered with a wreath of flowers; to-morrow his seat will be occupied by another. And in the rapid succession of these events ambition is gratified, hope is deferred, and men are forgotten. ALEXANDER brethren mourn.

CLARK MITCHELL, in whose memory we are met to-day, was a poor boy. He was one of a family that earned their bread according to the decree entered in the Garden. He knew none of the luxuries of life in his earlier days. His was a life of constant labor, mingled with anxiety as to the future, but always filled with ambition and hope. He was not content to remain a metal worker. After he had reached mature manhood he acquired that education that fitted him for the law and for a useful public career. MITCHELL was a good lawyer. He prepared his cases carefully and tried them exceptionally well. He entered public life as a student of men and events. He served four terms in the Legislature of the State of Kansas and rapidly rose to leadership in that body, a leadership that naturally suggested him for a higher and more useful position. He had an ambition for a seat in this House. Men of ability, of leadership in their community and of ambitton, somehow look to the National House of Representatives as a place in which to take a part in their country's work. I violate no confidence when I say that ALEX. MITCHELL had an ambition for many years to occupy a seat in this House and to become one of the leading Representatives in this great body. He was destined to serve here but a few days. That life that he had so trained and directed for usefulness, that ambition that he had at last seen gratified, was to be of but few days' service here.

I think he cast but one vote on an important measure in the House. He appeared upon the floor but a few times. Then he yielded to an illness that had seized him during his campaign for election. That illness grew upon him until finally, on the 7th day of July last, he yielded up the last there was of his life. There was something more than ordinary in his death. He died a death similar to those that we read of in the years that are gone. I can remember as a child that the first question asked of one who died was whether or not he died in the faith, whether he died in the hope of immortality and of heaven. It was rare in my early days that one ever heard the query asked as to how much life insurance a man had or how much property Those were questions that were of minor importance. The question of supreme importance in the hour of a man's death was whether or not he had died fit for the Master's kingdom. During the lingering months of Alexander Mitch-ELL's illness he meditated much on the hour that was fast approaching when he should bid farewell to everything that was dear in life—family, ambition, place, and all. When the final hour came, MITCHELL called his friends about him and took them by the hand and talked to them of his hope of immortality. He talked to them in the old way in which those who departed this life in the hope of blessed immortality used to talk to their friends. And one after another his friends gathered about him and he took his last words to bid them lead upright, Christian lives and fit themselves for the hour that he was so nearly approaching. He took his farewell of his chingred and his proaching. Death to him was the portal to everlasting life. In his wife, Death to him was the bound had a new baptism in his death the community in which he lived had a new baptism in the faith of the fathers. The entire community in which he lived felt a revival of the old-time religious sentiment that taught people to live well that they might die prepared for heaven.

MITCHELL performed well his part in life. It comes to but few men to acquire the distinction that he acquired; and but few men have left the community in which they lived with a more profound esteem of their fellow men than did Alexander C. MITCHELL.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, a Member from Kansas suggested the propriety of a brief tribute from me as a neighbor. and Nebraska, with contiguous territory, a common history, similar resources, like industries, having much in common politically, their Representatives well may deem themselves neighbors.

As a neighbor, I remember Alexander C. Mitchell but a few days in the House. We took our seats together. Individual design made us neighbors in the great West. A common ambition brought us here. Chance made us neighbors in the House

Upon similar solemn occasions Members recite the achievements and extol the ability and character of the deceased. can not speak of his congressional achievements, because in the morning of his career death claimed him. Against that claim how powerless are friendship, wealth, and position. Obedlence must be prompt and implicit. In this it matters not whether the call comes when he is on his couch at home and among friends or out upon the trackless ocean where the high product of naval genius clashes with a harsh fact of nature in the form of a deadly iceberg. His work will be left unfinished and his

Years ago I read—let me confess with some effort—some of the essays of Emerson. One, in its choice expression, practical philosophy, and subtle human touch, impressed me more perhaps than all the other writings of the transcendental sage. That was "Compensation." The nice balancing of the phenomena of nature and human experiences, charmingly told, furnishes a source to which many could turn for solace and comfort.

If our deceased brother was denied a long and honorable career, which his years seemed to warrant and his own ability fit him, there are still compensations for his untimely taking off. He came to this House with the high ideals of a new Member. His ideals of the individual and collective membership have suffered no rude shock. An exalted estimate of legislation proposed received no rude awakening, to be followed by a downward revision. Men and measures probably both appeared in the glamour of ideality. The belief that there was little for the party but all to be for the State received no harsh contradiction

If there was aught in store for disillusions; if selfishness was to appear when altruism was expected; if the demands of the country were to be subordinated to the claims of party; if the great names on the rolls of the House, giants of State, were to be proved as standing on feet of clay, and if in the grind of caucus and committee the idealistic surface should give way to the "seamy side"; if practical legislation was to receive the impress of the force, will, and influence of selfish interests or selfish men, then these disillusions were not for him.

Nor was he, after years of faithful devotion to his district and Nation, in the fullness of years and the ripeness of experience, for some real or fancied error in judgment, denied a new vote of confidence by the people for whom he labored.

That he was selected from a great district, having many great men, to sit in this historic Hall and mingle with the mighty; that his ability warranted, his achievements deserved, and character justified this distinction are proud facts bequeathed by him to his family and posterity. Had his life been spared for the usual span his services in this body would have marked him for its honors and distinctions is the belief of his friends and the conviction of impartial acquaintances. This is a rich heritage in this country, where excellence and character are the unfailing insignia of rank and worth.

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, we assemble to-day on a sad- and extraordinary occasion. On last Lord's day we met in this Chamber and lifted up our feeble voices in paying a tribute to the memory of a noble son of Kansas, our colleague; we are here again to-day to say the farewell words as best we may to the earthly career of another of her honored sons—our colleague—Alexander C. Mitchell, and strive to cherish his memory in the years to come.

O, not in cruelty, not in wrath, The reaper came that day; 'Twas an angel visited the green earth And took the flowers away.

Let us not be unmindful that while we are mourning our loss, that at this very hour there are being spoken, from almost every pulpit in the land, words of grief for the victims of the greatest disaster of the century.

We are here still, but forcibly feel the transitory nature of human life. We are shadows pursuing one another, and soon there is an end.

Be ye ready; the summons cometh quickly.

ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL had but a brief service in this House, yet on other fields of usefulness he served long and well, ever active, clean, true, and honored wherever known. He at all times had the courage of his convictions, which was so well illustrated during his illness in this city, when, against the advice of his physician, he insisted on being brought to this Chamber, where he cast his first vote on a measure he regarded as vital to the best interest of the country, and which proved to be his last in this Chamber.

As a lawyer he was ever strong and trustworthy. As a member of another legislative body, where I knew him best, he stood in the forefront advocating measures for the betterment of society. As a citizen he did much for his city, State, and country, and seemed ever to realize that in life's voyage life's struggles are all failures if they do not from day to day produce something done, something said, that makes the lives of others better, sweeter, and nobler.

Who God doth late and early pray, More of His grace than fights to lend, And walks with man from day to day As with a brother and a friend.

ALEXANDER C. Metchell's Christian life was so carnest, strong, and steadfast that when the inevitable messenger with the inverted torch beckoned him to depart, he obeyed the summons and approached the journey,

Sustained and soothed By an unfaltering trust, founded upon an unwavering faith in Him, who said "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee," and went down through the valley of the shadow of death over into the realm where "Nearer, My God, to Thee" is no longer a song, but is an everlasting reality.

Mr. MURDOCK. Within my memory I have record of no one who surpassed in earnest desire to be of service in this world the late Alexander C. MITCHELL.

As I look back to-day upon his brief career in Congress, the thought of him which rises singly and persists with emphasis, above all others in connection with my knowledge of him, is that of his pathetically determined devotion to duty.

Six months before he came here as a Member of Congress he was the embodiment of vitality, vigor, health; the splendors of sturdiness, breadth of shoulder, strength of limb, clearness of eye, certainty of movement with all the marvels of physical confidence, the confidence that paints the cheek of youth with the flush of daring, these were his at fifty as they had been at sixteen.

And then came dissolution—certain, unmistakable, swift—remorselessly swift. I saw the man who had been physically perfect in the fall of 1910, the man who had been from under the stress of a long campaign, bend beneath disease. I saw him creep into this Chamber, sick, worn with pain, pallid under the pitiless levy upon his vitality. I saw him grope with shaking white hands among the red desks here, sink into his seat, and await the roll call, and, with a momentary alertness, cast his vote, with that which seemed unmistakable interest, then lapse back again into his lonely, weary, hopeless battle.

And yet I have thought often, it was not interest that brought him here. He was too ill for that. He came at the call of duty. This was paramount with him—to render a full measure of service. Many another, close to the grave as he, the issue of a campaign flaring its legislative hour here, the hue and cry of faction, the noisy joust of partisans would have summoned in vain.

There was a strong, firm foundation, deeply laid, for this characteristic in our friend. Nature gave him in equal proportions the qualities of kindliness and earnestness. It was never in him to be unkind, and he could not be purposeless. He could be candid without being cruel, and he could be uncompromising without being intolerant. I believe it was possible for ALEXANDER MITCHELL to win a victory without a sense of triumph to a greater degree than any man I have ever known in political life. If he were ambitious, and I doubt that he ever was, he wore but little of ambition's livery. Of plot and dabious plan, of sleight and equivocation, he had but little knowledge, and he made no use.

But he stood ready to obey the command of the day's work, and through his life the call was incessant. He was out of the university in 1889. After that he served as county attorney at Lawrence, Kans.; many years as a regent of the Kansas University; many years, also, as a member of the legislature. Eventually he was elected to Congress.

He came here in the short session of the Sixty-first Congress, the session which followed the election of 1910. He was intensely interested in the vast administrative forces of the Government as they are found in Washington.

As a young man his activities had revealed to him the governmental processes as they exist in county seats. Later he had opportunity to know thoroughly the larger mechanism of the State, and the tremendous machinery of the National Government fascinated him, as it must fascinate most men when they approach it closely to study it. The magnitude of the great departments of this Government, their seemingly endless divisions and subdivisions, the inertia of precedent, which sometimes makes them appear helpless in a leash of tape—the might lness often of rule and regulation and frequent futility of law—the complexities of expenditure and collection, the adjustment, renewal, and evolution of Congress and court, of Navy, Army, Post Office—these instruments of the democracy at once invite the student and resist him; by their very intricacy they becken him to investigation and understanding and defy him.

This challenge the late Alex. Mitchell accepted with spirit. Industrious, discriminating, thorough, executive, he set about the business of his new life. The old Congress which he visited in its closing session passed away. The new Congress convened in extraordinary session. Mr. Mitchell came with the others. It was evident to all from the first that he was ill. During the spring he attended the more important sessions. One day he went back to Kansas, and in midsummer, before the close of the special session, he died.

Somewhere I have read or heard—I do not know if it be true—that when Horace Greeley was dying he murmured to those about him, "Fame is a vapor, popularity an accident; riches take wings; those who bless to-day will curse to-morrow. Only one thing endures—character."

This must be the thought, in part at least, of everyone who knows that death is upon him. When the stage is set for the last scene this thought must for an instant stand before a man stark, detached, solitary, dominant. When the tinseled vanities are shoved back and away, when the glittering aspirations of a lifetime flicker and go out, when those things which long we thought were substance are fading into shadows, then through the gray light which I fancy falls upon the world as the dying see it, that in a man which is the product of conscience—character—must glow deep, vital, eternal, out of the drab midst of things.

ALEX. MITCHELL knew the moment of his dissolution. Of that moment's alternatives—hope and despair—he chose hope. To those who loved him, at his bedside, he spoke of death calmly, with a sweet certainty of the future. There came to him, as there came to William McKinley, the soothing echo of an old-time hymn, the mighty comfort of a line from the Sermon on the Mount. And as he passed on he went as gently as he had lived, mighty in his faith—that death is not—that life is, primal, absolute, eternal.

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, ALEXANDER CLARK MITCHELL was not a Member of this House long enough to become familiar to the majority of the body, but he inspired a sincere respect in all who met with him. The fatal malady, from which he died, fastened itself upon him during his campaign, but he did not realize that there was anything seriously the matter with him until after he had been elected. He came on to Washington and took up his duties here, but the marks of patient suffering were already upon his strong, kind face. He came to the House daily for a short time during the extra session, but was soon confined to his room, and his last appearance in the House was when he came over to vote for reciprocity. He smiled upon his friends when he entered the room, but as soon as his features were at rest, while he was listening to the discussion, we could see all too plainly the shadow of his approaching end.

His life will not be measured by his achievements here, but by his record at Lawrence, Kans., where he came with his father early in life and commenced his struggle as a blacksmith. And it was in this sturdy calling, perhaps, while yet in his youth, that his strong character was formed. At this toilsome occupation he earned enough to carry him through the law department of the university. He afterwards opened an office in Lawrence, in competition with some of the ablest lawyers of this country, and soon succeeded in sufficiently impressing himself upon the favorable consideration of this scholarly community to be elected county attorney. He afterwards served for six years in the Kansas Legislature, and was for four years a regent of the State University, and was finally elected a Member of this body. He was an able lawyer, and, had he lived, he would have made his mark in Congress.

He was a strong, clean, manly man. If you still retain the little booklet containing the pictures of those who served in the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, turn to his picture and note the strong, clear-cut features. It is a splendid likeness of one who was in every way a splendid man. He was sincere, honest, and loyal, as well as a fearless advocate of every cause he believed was right.

It can be truly said of him that he did not seek distinction and political preferment for ambition's sake, but in the hope that he might serve the people and the country he loved. He was a good lawyer, and had a good practice; but never became rich or even well to do, because he gave too generously of his time and service to the poor.

ALEXANDER MITCHELL was devoted to his wife and children, and they repaid him with an affection and tender solicitude for his welfare that assuaged the anguish of our departed colleague during the long days and nights of his silent, patient suffering, until at last the Angel of Death in pity released his soul from his weary pain-racked body.

Life itself is an impenetrable mystery, and before death we bow our heads in silent awe. Its unsounded depths we know not. We cry out for a light that will satisfy our reason and our judgment, but it comes not; yet somehow there steals into our inner consciousness an intuitive feeling that all is well. The calm beauty of the dead, the benediction of tears, the feeling that takes possession of us that there is something sacred in the presence of death itself, as though we knew through some unconscious process of the mind that a divine visitant had touched the dying eyes—these and other intangible things calm our spirits as the cooing half-audible words of a young mother that can not be understood soothes and lulls to sleep the newborn babe.

To Alexander Mitchell, however, there was a surer guide. He grounded his unwavering faith upon the old Bible, that has, in all the generations since the Gospels were written, helped to sustain men in their darker hours. Let us believe that what we poor mortals lament as the death—the last sad end of him we loved—was but the dawning of the eternal morning for Alexander Mitchell,

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day to pay our tribute to Alexander Clark Mitchell.

My acquaintance with him was but slight. Like myself, he was just entering upon the duties of a Congressman, so that I had only seen him occasionally, but I knew of the high esteem that he was held in by those who knew him well.

On account of his malady he was unable to be present at the daily sessions as often as he would have liked to, but when it was necessary for him to perform some public duty he came and bore his pain and sufferings quietly and made no complaint, and his voice was heard for what he believed was right.

I was one of the Congressmen, Mr. Speaker, designated to go to his home and attend the funeral, and there I learned of the love and respect given him by his fellow neighbors. I also learned of the high esteem in which he was held by his townsmen, and to me no higher tribute of esteem can be paid than to know that all his neighbors loved him. The great men of the State were there to pay their respect, and beside them stood the humblest citizen to pay his last tribute to his beloved friend who had gone to the great beyond. I learned from his neighbors about his character. He was a strong man, a loving man, a man who walked erect among his fellow men and was counted a manly man. It seems strange that Providence should take away from the activities of life this man of strong character that was able to do so much good, be of so much service, and do so much kindness to his fellow man. We do not understand it, but God in his mysterious way knows what is best, We love to think of strong men of noble character, whether they are in the humble pursuits of life or if they attain eminence. We judge a man by what he does, and Congressman MITCHELL was a man upright in his actions and always ready to help mankind.

I saw the love in the home; I saw the gentle wife, the loving daughter, and the son. By the surroundings I knew that it had been a happy home and one that all might love to enter, and my sympathy went out to that wife, to that son and daughter who had lost a loving husband and a respected father.

The loving tribute by his pastor, the crowded edifice where the neighbors and friends came to pay their last respects, the hundreds that stood outside showed to me the love and respect in which he was held.

We laid him away under the big trees in a beautiful cemetery near the city in which he had given a long life of usefulness to his neighbors and to his State.

I am conscious, Mr. Speaker, of having done scant justice to the many excellent traits of character of our departed friend and colleague. Whatever is spoken here is but the gratification we have in paying tribute to our departed brother. His life was his most eloquent eulogy, and to us it is only left to regret that he should have been cut off in the very prime of life, when he could have been of great service to his State, his country, and his fellow men.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, some one has said, "When, after a long acquaintance, you feel that the more you know of a man the better you like him, you may safely call that man a loyal and worthy friend." Measured by this rule, ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL was called friend by more intimate associates than any man who has lived in Kansas. His strongest personal characteristic was the light that shone from his strong face and honest eyes, attracting with its invitation of honesty and helpfulness; and never disappointing the faith imposed in him.

His death, in the midst of achievement of a well-trained, fruitful middle age, was by him bravely and calmly met. To these numerous intimate friends, and the citizens of a great State, who have come to know his value as a public servant, his death was a tragedy.

And no one who knew him doubts that had he been spared, to have served here even a few months, his associates here and the people of our great Nation would have said, "Knowing him better, we see his great worth."

And this, indeed, was the tragedy, that he who could have helped us so much; he, whose strong hand had been so faithfully trained to work for the people he loved, just as it was about to reap the fruitage of a strenuous life of toil, should be stricken at his post of duty. So far as man is concerned, there is naught to reason why? There is but one answer, and that is, "It was God's will."

As was so eloquently said of him by his pastor in the beautiful funeral oration, "Mr. MITCHELL was a toller." His fellow man will never know, his country can never know, what it cost him, from youth to middle age, to answer "Here" at the call of duty in the Nation's great Congress a few weeks before his untimely death.

It is a long road from the machinist's bench in Cincinnati, Ohio, by way of a turning lathe in Kansas, finally a legal education in the university and a drudging lawyer's office, and public service to a seat in the National Congress—all marked by nonest, strenuous toil that left its furrows in the strong lines of his kindly face.

Modern history, tradition, and song and story is full of incidents of the great achievements of a Lincoln educated by the light of pine knots, and a Garfield toiling on a towpath, to higher mental attainments. But in the modern times, when the pine knots have disappeared from our civilization and the laborer of the towpath and the "man with the hoe" have almost been erased from our American industrial life, and their places taken by the skilled mechanic of greater power and wider experience, are there not among these, surrounded by endowed colleges, great universities, and well-filled libraries, Lincolns and Garfields with little assistance from any of these great institutions, courageously earning their daily bread by honest toil and slowly mounting the steeps of higher training, to the end that they may serve their fellow men?

Shall they deserve less credit because their pine knots, lighted by their own hands, are brighter than those of another age, and their towpaths of service broader and longer?

So, too, the circles of their lives must be broader and achievements stronger than when men and our national life existed in the pine knot and the towpath age. And this man of toil, our friend, prepared himself for his work by close touch with the real things of modern life for the great opportunities it affords for real, unselfish service.

"He was a workman who needed not to be ashamed." As in earlier life he wrought with his hands things worth while, he saw in life things worth while and attained them for others and for himself.

Thomas Carlyle's father was a stonemason, and the son was always proud of the father's bridges. They stood the test of time and strain.

So the children and dear ones of our departed friend shall find in his work in every place the bridges that span great deeds and that endure the test of time.

It is no small tribute to the earnestness, industry, and power of achievement of a man of the culture and power of intellect of Representative MITCHELL to be able to say that at one time in his life with his own hands he toiled in the greatest machine shops of the West, or that his hands held the instruments which put the last fine touch on the strongly formed and highly polished machinery that brought service and safety and hap-piness to the members of the human family. And yet this same brain and these same strong hands a short time later framed legal briefs that settled the interests of the same great company in whose mills he worked, in the courts, guided the des-tiny of this State and held the attention of this Nation,

Mr. MITCHELL was really a great lawyer. As nearly as any man I ever knew he carried out the lesson of Lincoln's advice to the young man-

If you can't be a good man and a good lawyer, leave off trying to be a lawyer at all.

Mr. MITCHELL endeavored in his innermost soul to be a good lawyer and a good man, and he succeeded; as his broad, strong intellect strove for real things of life, it sought and found the things worth while in the problems of his profession. neither in trickery nor subterfuge, and lived and worked to defend right by the law and not to smother right with the law.

He would not have stooped to have offended justice and public rights by seeking the release of criminals by invoking the jury's sympathy for the criminal's wife and children.

But when widowed mothers and defenseless orphans were in trouble no day was too long or night too dark for him to find a way for their relief. No man ever consulted his pocketbook before he sought his advice or felt himself robbed after he had done so.

It was not strange, therefore, that much of this man's professional time was given for causes that brought him little or no remuneration. When it was determined a few years ago that the standard of the profession of law in the State should be raised and the examinations for admission to the bar taken control of by the supreme court, it was but natural that such a man should be chosen as a member of the commission to conduct these examinations. He held the place with honor to the State and its great court until his election to Congress. So, frequently, came these calls for great public duties.

His legal services were sought in times of public strife by the governor, the State officers, and the legislature.

As chairman of the judiciary committee of the house of representatives for several terms, he gave honest and efficient service. His committee was neither a morgue for just measures nor a fanfare of trumpets for demagogues. It was a workshop where the people's laws were molded with jealous care and brought into light and measures of avarice and viciousness promptly and firmly strangled. His greatest single cases were, perhaps, the Perkins insurance case and the Kansas bankguaranty case. Each of these ran through the State and numerous Federal courts, and will be precedents of importance in future litigation in their respective branches of law. The latter case was conducted simultaneously with similar cases in Oklahoma and Nebraska, and was followed in the State courts and, in some form, in all the Federal courts, ending in the Supreme Court of the United States, where Mr. MITCHELL appeared only a few months before his death to assist in its argument. His services in the case, in maintaining the cause of the State, was invaluable and, as has been noted, was of far more than State importance.

This is not the time or place to speak in detail of his legal achievements. In the last weeks of his life he was brave and unselfish, as he has always been. He bore with greatest fortitude severest pain in silence or with the smile of his healthful days rather than give alarm to the members of his family

A weaker man would never have come to Washington, but the same call to duty that had marked his entire life caused him to respond from a bed of pain to the call of the President, and with pallid cheek and unsteady step mount the steps of the National Capitol at Washington at the special session.

His mind was still clear and forceful. He entered into the spirit of all the contests over public questions with his old-time vigor and enthusiasm. But one day there came the words, "Oh, there is nothing worth while but health." Then came the hurried trip home and the end of a useful life.

And so, in sight of the great university which had taught him and which he had served as adviser and regent, and in view of the beautiful little city which sheltered his home and friends, we built the grassy mound and heaped it o'er with flowers from the hands of those who loved him. We left him in the swelling bosom of the great Kansas plain, bold and boundless as the ocean, like the spirit of him who had gone away.

He has lived successfully in the highest sense if those he leaves in this world, when in doubt and indecision over the affairs of life listen for his voice, and in the silence seem to hear it, and strive to do as he would have them do were he yet with them.

And in this sense the life spirit of our departed friend shall live upon this earth as the spirit which God gave, loved, and took away again lives in Paradise.

In the home circle, in the affairs of the community, city and State, his voice shall be heard, and all shall feel the influence of his guiding hand. And so, the good men do lives after them.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the career of ALEXANDER MITCHELL in this legislative body was indeed a brief But it was long enough to impress upon his fellow Members the quality and character of the man. His seat was almost within an arm's reach of my own desk. He appeared in this House but a few brief days. I think that we were all impressed We also were impressed with the conviction that the hand of death had already taken hold of what, when he appeared here, was a frail body. with his personality.

From this brief observation of the man I feel absolutely certain of certain traits of his character. I am sure that he was a sincere man. I am certain he was possessed and controlled by a very deep sense of public duty. I am certain that such ambition as he may have possessed was an ambition to devote all of his inherited and developed powers in contributing to the public welfare. Mr. MITCHELL was a good example of what I shall call the "Kansas type of American citizenship." It is no fulsome praise of the able and distinguished sons of Kansas in both Houses of Congress at the present time to say that there is a Kansas type and quality of citizenship, and that for now more than half a century it has performed a most useful and important part in shaping and determining great national problems with which we as a people have had to contend.

The character and quality of that citizenship were determined more than half a century ago in the mighty struggles that were grouped about the settlement of the national problems leading up to and culminating in the Civil War. Gladstone said of the American Constitution that it was the greatest instrument ever evolved from the intellect of man. And yet that great Constitution, which was a charter of human liberty, had placed in it, doubtless by virtue of the compromise of necessity, one provision absolutely out of harmony with all the balance of that immortal document.

I refer to the provisions which permitted the importation of slaves for a period of 20 years and recognized the right of the continuation of slavery in certain particular States indefinitely. In the very nature of the case those opposing principles must have developed as they did develop eventually-into a mortal combat. Kansas, a border State, if not the seat of the material phases of that struggle, was, in a sense which perhaps can not be said of any other State, the arena and forum in which there was the mighty battling of the ideas upon which that struggle turned and by which it was eventually solved. And so we are not surprised that Kansas citizenship is always earnest, aggressive, if not controversial. The Kansas spirit is sincere,

It is an interesting study which we as public men have forced upon us from time to time—to ascertain the different contributions from the different States of the Union to the composite character of American citizenship. We expect from New England conservatism, and we are rarely disappointed. From Kansas we expect a clear definition and an aggressive presentation of the two sides of every great national question. The middle of the road in Kansas is used for automobiles and for carrying to the market the bountiful harvests from her fertile fields. A public man in Kansas may be on the wrong side of a great public question and still retain his self-respect and the respect of his fellow citizens, but he must be on one side of the question. The middle of the road is not an arena for the solution of public questions in that young, virile, and vigorous Commonwealth.

We now have another period of the testing out of the fundamental questions of the American Constitution. This decade is trying again the justness and the correctness of the elemental principles upon which this Government rests, and in the loss of a representative Member of the State of Kansas a gap is created which will be felt not only by the Commonwealth of Kansas, but by the entire Nation.

We have had forced upon us recently again the perpetual lesson of the uncertainty of human life. One week ago tonight, plying its way from Great Britain to the port of New York, what was supposed to be the greatest triumph in maritime construction was under full speed. It was a scene of brilliancy, of feasting, and of quiet confidence in the complete mastery of modern invention over the perils of the sea; and yet within less than two hours 1,500 men lost their lives, their souls summoned into the presence of their Maker. Fifteen hundred men, the very flower of Anglo-Saxon civilization, perished. Their bodies were entombed in old ocean's gray and melancholy waste.

Within the year we have lost some of the most prominent Members of this House of Representatives. Gen. Bingham, "the father of the House," has but recently disappeared from our midst. David J. Foster, one of nature's noblemen, has gone, and, as one of his close friends, I can scarcely yet realize that he has gone forever. I find myself almost involuntarily expecting to meet his manly form and to greet his noble spirit

Within the year we have lost Judge Madison, another of the noble sons of Kansas, a man who, for the period of his service, I believe, impressed himself and his strong individuality and convictions upon us as forcefully and with as enduring an effect as any man who has been a member of this body during my term of service. Almost in an instant he passed from his home here to the home beyond.

Mr. MITCHELL had scarcely become familiar to us, his co-Members, when for him the golden bowl was broken, the silver cord was loosed, and he, another traveler, went on to his long

That bourne from which no traveler returns.

Seeing what I did of his personality in the few brief days of his service, I am not surprised, but much gratified, to hear the account of his manly passing on to the Eternal Beyond that has been given to us by members of his home delegation. Knowing that the summons was upon him, facing the realities of the great and unlimited future, he indeed went-

Not, like the quarry-slave at night, Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed By an unfaltering trust—

He approached his grave-

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I confess the difficulty of the task of undertaking to pronounce a eulogy upon the life and character of my predecessor, ALEXANDER CLARK MITCHELL, whose untimely death made it possible for me to render the lesser and humbler service that I may be able to give to the people of his district.

I was not well or intimately acquainted with him; we met but a few times. But, perhaps, we can have a more just estimate of a man if we are not on terms of intimacy with him. The common rumor, the opinion of others who knew him, his reputation in the city and the State in which he lived, his public service and the well-known facts of his life, afford, perhaps, a basis for a more accurate judgment of the real value of the man. Our admiration or affection for a man might warp our judgment, or perhaps on account of that indefinable and subtle weakness in human character whereby our likes and dislikes arise out of trivial matters, it may be if we were intimately acquainted with one that our estimate of him might be unjust on account of the very intimacy of the acquaintance. Therefore I can say that I am free to mention here the estimate of the people of the second district of Kansas of the services and the character of Alexander Clark Mitchell. It has been mentioned here that he began life as a mechanic. Do we realize that the future ages will estimate the first and perhaps the second and possibly the third century of the life of this Republic not so much by what was said or written or sung as by the work of the hands of the American citizen?

Surely the early centuries and generations of our country will live in history as the age of mechanical genius, and their fame will finally rest on the marvelous achievements of the mechanic. It was therefore fitting and proper that the young man should have developed his intelligence by coming in touch with the greatest of all American enterprises. Having come to Kansas in 1867, when he was but a child, and having had the privilege and advantage of growing up upon a Kansas farm surrounded by neighbors who were sturdy, honest, earnest, and filled with hope for the future, he grew up. as other Kansas boys grew, conscious of his strength and e ger for the battle of life. He went back to Cincinnati, where he was born, and learned his trade, and then returned to Kansas and began work in the machine shops in Topeka. Then realizing that he had capacity for the acquirement of great learning, and having been urged by his friends, he took the law course in the Kansas University and graduated, in 1889, with honor and distinction. You will notice that he was not an early graduate, that he was then 29 years of age, that he had waited until his mind had matured and until he was fully able to grasp the real purpose and meaning of the law. He had passed beyond that enthusiastic age of the young law student wherein he thinks that the triumph of the court room or before the jury is the final and greatest achievement of the lawyer.

ALEXANDER CLARK MITCHELL was a success as a lawyer. He was born of a people who were formed for success. No wellinformed person can read the name ALEXANDER MITCHELL without knowing at once that it originated in one of the least favored naturally of all the countries of the world, but one of the most distinguished spots beneath all the stars—the old Kingdom of Scotland. He was descended, evidently, of that virile, purposeful, and masterful race of people who have left their mark and their monuments throughout the English-speaking world. He came of a Scotch family that had emigrated to Ireland and later came to the United States. He represented a citizenship somewhat different from either one of the two original civilizations that were founded on this shore. We have the New England civilization and that other civilization that was founded at the mouth of the James River. The northern civilization was committed to the great purpose of promoting intelligence. It worshiped books as if they were idols, relying upon the diffusion of general knowledge for the welfare of the Nation; and, above all things, it cherished the pride and strength of conscious intellectual supremacy. The other civilization was founded on the beautiful ideals of medieval chivalry, the exaltation of honor above all earthly treasure, and the glory of courage and of achievements in arms.

Each of these two civilizations was wedded to the past, the one at the North going back to those thoughts that culminated other drawing its inspiration from the traditions of Anglo-Saxon pride and glory.

Separate and apart from these has come the western citizen ship, that has unconsciously adopted the philosophy of Epictetus, who taught that-in the expression so wonderfully wrought out by Milton; the

With respect to those things over which we have no power let us have no concern whatsoever nor trouble our minds therewith; but let us address ourselves to those things over which we have power, and with those matters let us with all our might perform our daily task.

The western people have disregarded the prejudices and the hatreds of the past and have turned their faces toward the future. There are few monuments on the plains of Kansas or the western prairie erected to celebrate the past; but nearly all that greets the eye was built to provide for the necessities and the welfare of the future.

ALEXANDER CLARK MITCHELL was one of those who grasped fully that western philosophy. He was not wedded to the past. He acted in the living present. He hoped for the future. His whole career is proof that it is of value to the individual and to society to toil up from the bottom to the top, from the lowest round of the ladder to the highest. No one ever boasted of having ridden in a comfortable seat in a railway car to the top of Pike's Peak, but whoever has toiled up those nine miles of in-clined plane and finally stood upon its summit never ceased to remember it.

There is no achievement in being lifted; the real achievement is climbing. ALEXANDER MITCHELL'S life was devoted to the present and the future, not to realize unwarranted ambitions for, as a Member said, he was not one who was cursed with unwarrantable ambitions. He was one whose life and whose character was so fortunate that those about him who realized his worth took notice of it and urged him forward among the people as a man who could be trusted by them. He served in many capacities, as it was said here. He was a county attorney, and that office is a difficult one in the State in which he lived. He was a member of the board of regents of the State University, an office the services of which are gratuitously given, but which is an honor in itself, and which manifested his desire to promote the greatest institution in the State. He served in the legislature.

He took part in framing some of the wisest and some of the best laws on the statute books of Kansas, and I believe that among his greatest public services was the part he took in establishing firmly the bank guaranty law of that State. Perhaps he was deeply impressed by those who lost their money in banks that had failed. Possibly he saw the sufferings and the calamities that had come to the poor in times past, when the savings of a lifetime were swept away in a night; and he devoted his talents most earnestly in support of a law that would make it sure that whoever deposited his money would not only have the good faith of the bank in which he placed it. but the united strength of all of the banks that were associated together under the law for mutual protection. If he had done no other public service, this alone would have entitled him to a lasting place in the history of Kansas. We are told that the greatest characteristic of his life was his just estimate of public service. The time has passed when a man in public life can regard himself simply as one who is enjoying an honor.

The intelligent public now requires that he must conduct himself as one who is performing a service. He will not be permitted to also a performing a service. permitted to claim any excellence on account of the honor he has enjoyed, but he must rest his claim for public esteem upon the service that he has rendered. ALEXANDER CLARK MITCHELL regarded public office as a service and the incumbent of a public office as a public servant whose duty it was to render an account of his stewardship.

And in that light he discharged every public duty that was thrust upon him. In this spirit he performed his duty as county attorney; he performed his duty as a member of the State Legislature of Kansas; he performed his duty as a member of the board of regents of the university, in each and every case not only to the public satisfaction, but with that active and energetic interest in the matter in hand which transcends the mere requirements of statute or custom.

He came to this House, as has been said, with the shadow of death upon him. He was afflicted with a cancer in his stomach. That is perhaps the most dreaded and terrible malady that can afflict the human race. Believing that he might have some hope of recovery from a surgical operation he went as far as Kansas City, Mo., and on the 30th day of April submitted to the surgeon's knife. Having discovered that his stomach was in the grip of a cancer the surgeon was obliged to close the inci-sion and inform him that he was without hope of recovery.

Something was said here of that beautiful essay on "Compensation," written by Emerson, perhaps the finest effort of that gentle and pure-minded philosopher. But can we reason that nature will compensate us? Is nature all we have? Is not nature rather the puzzle and the task that is set before men, that they might unravel her mysteries, that they might conquer her forces, and that they might develop their intelligence by avoiding the wrath and the destruction of her elements? Nature has no respect for persons. She has no refuge for innocence. She has no regard for pain. In her mysterious processes she recks not of death or suffering, but performs the mandates of an irresistible power, even though all that was dear and all that was beloved met with destruction.

Men have said that nature has taught another life; that the coming and going of the flowers are a prophecy of resurrection; that nature is an open book, out of which the mystery of the future might be read, and that our final destiny can be ascertained by consulting the panorama that she spreads before us in this earthly life. I can not understand that philosophy. Some one wrote asking the question

Is it true, O God in Heaven, that the strongest suffer most; That the wisest wander farthest and most hopelessly are lost? That the mark of rank in nature is capacity for pain; That the anguish of the singer makes the sweetness of the strain?

When we think it over it seems as though we must answer, "It is true." The hope of immortality was not bred by flowers or foliage. I would imagine rather that in the utter desolation of some desert, where there was nothing but sand and sky, men held up their hands and said, "Where shall we retreat? How shall we escape from this solitude?" And it was in those solitudes and wildernesses that the message came which has comforted mankind in this life.

No; I would not say that the coming and going of the seasons or the lesson of the leaves or the flowers can teach that there is another life. If there is anything in this earthly scene or in this experience outside of revelation that would teach the mighty mystery of immortality, it would seem to be the love that exists among mortals.

This was one of the early thoughts of men. Perhaps 30 centuries ago it was written—and it is one of the most beautiful stories that was ever told—that a certain young king was about to be sacrificed to appease the wrath of the gods. She, who loved him, came and asked him if they should ever meet again, and answering, he said:

I have asked that dreadful question of the hills that look eternal, of the flowing streams that lucid flow forever, of the stars, amid whose field of azure, My raised spirit hath trod in glory, and they all were dumb, But, now, as I thus gaze upon thy living face, I feel that the love that kindles through its beauty Can never wholly perish, and we shall meet again.

The pure and unselfish devotion, given without thought of reward or recompense, argues the final working out of justice, and would seem to be the most convincing earthly proof of immortality.

Mr. MITCHELL, when about to go under the surgeon's knife, and that very evening before he submitted to the dreadful ordeal, sent a message of sympathy to an attorney who lives in my city, whose son had been killed on that day by accident, it being the second child that he had lost within a year or two, and even though Mr. MITCHELL might reasonably expect that he would never revive, he did not forget his brother attorney who was suffering the agony of bereavement at that hour. He was taken to his home in Lawrence.

The hot summer came and yet it was stated in the local papers, several friends have said, that he faced the end with the undaunted fortitude and the unwavering purpose of that heroic race from which he was descended. Day by day, conscious that death was approaching, suffering from the incision that was healing slowly, the martyr waited patiently, and through it all he comforted himself that this life may not bring us justice, but if there is a future life that is not nature's work, but transcends nature, in that life we will have exact justice. He was a man who loved justice and who wished everyone to succeed. He wished everyone to have hope. I do not believe he ever said a word in his life or did an act that would destroy the hope of a human mortal, and it was with a sublime hope he was sustained until the end. He gave up his life in the very midst of a great career, just when he was passing the half century mark, when his mind and his faculties had ripened, when his public services would have been of the greatest value, yet he surrendered it all as calmly as if it were a mere matter of duty. And thus ended the life of ALEXANDER MITCHELL. No one will ever read or know of his life, his character, or his work who will not profit by having studied it, and no young man who has a noble ambition can fail to profit by his example.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the resolution previously adopted, and as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Alexander C. MITCHELL, the House will now stand adjourned.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Monday, April 22, 1912, at 12 o'clock craft found her grave. This information prompts the belief that there may be bodies which will yet appear on the surface. Therefore I propose that the President of the United States shall be requested to dispatch as many of the revenue cutters as may be necessary to that spot as early as possible, and to remain there or thereabouts for at least one month in order to search for and recover the bodies of such unfortunates as may have been brought to the surface.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 23349. An act providing for publicity of contributions and expenditures for the purpose of influencing or securing the nomination of candidates for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE UNITED STATES V. THE AMERICAN TOBACCO CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 3607, under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3607) to give the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States to certain organizas tions or persons in the suit of the United States against American Tobacco Co. and others.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have already discussed this subject very fully upon two occasions, and I do not intend this morning to reiterate what I have heretofore said. I am very much concerned with respect to the subject, and I am deeply solicitous that some way shall be provided for the review of the decree of the circuit court by the Supreme Court of the United Naturally, I have been more or less in communication with those who favor the general end which I seek to accomplish. I have discovered that the bill will receive more strength if it be so modified that the direction goes to the Attorney General to take, on behalf of the United States, the appeal which he might have taken within 60 days after the decree was rendered, together with a provision that counsel for those who sought to intervene in the circuit court for the purpose of objecting to the decree may file arguments and be heard orally in the Supreme Court.

Personally I have no doubt whatever of the power of Congress to confer the right of intervention; but I am so anxious that we shall muster here the utmost strength for the general proposition that I have concluded to offer an amendment by way of a substitute for the entire bill, and I now propose the following amendment by way of a substitute for the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa offers a substitute for the bill, which will be read.

Mr. SHIVELY. The substitute has not been printed?
Mr. CUMMINS. It has not.
Mr. SHIVELY. It seems to me that we should have a larger attendance here when the substitute is read. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Culberson
Cullom
Cummins
Curtis
Davis
Dillingham
Fall
Foster
Gallinger
Gronna Ashurst Bacon Borah Brandegee Bristow Root Shively Smith, Ariz. Smith, Ga. Smith, S. C. Kern Lippitt McCumber McLean Martine, N. J. O'Gorman Oliver Overman Page Paynter Percy Pomerene Rayner Brown Burnham Catron Chilton Clark, Wyo. Clarke, Ark. Crane Smoot Stephenson Stone Sutherland Tillman Gronna Heyburn Johnston, Ala. Crane Crawford Jones

Mr. JONES. My colleague [Mr. Poindexter] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Secretary will read the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The Secretary. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert the following:

acting clause of the bill and to insert the following:

The Attorney General of the United States is hereby directed to appeal for, and on behalf of, the complainant, the United States, from the decree entered in the Circuit Court of the United States, from for the Southern District of New York on the 16th day of November, 1911, in a suit wherein the United States is the complainant and the American Tobacco Co. and others are the defendants, to the Supreme Court of the United States, giving such notice or notices and taking such proceedings as are required by the law and the practice in such cases to effect such appeal. To enable such appeal to be taken and perfected, the time therefor, and for all notices and proceedings provided in the law or the practice to be given or taken, is hereby extended until the expiration of the period of 60 days from and after the date upon which this act takes effect.

SEC. 2. When the aforesaid cause comes on for argument in the Supreme Court of the United States, counsel for the States, organizations, and associations, which sought to intervene in the said sult in the said Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. In order to object to said decree, shall have the right to file printed arguments and be heard orally on behalf of the United States, subject to such order or orders respecting the number of printed arguments and the number and length of oral arguments as the court may prescribe.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect immediately upon its passage and approval.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the original bill, offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. CUMMINS. Do I understand the Chair to say that the amendment was offered by the Senator from Ohio?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the original bill. The original bill must be perfected before the motion is acted upon to strike it out.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand. I supposed the question would first be upon the substitute, but I readily see my error.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins] covers substantially the matter contained in the amendment which I offered the other day. In view of the presentation of the substitute bill, I now withdraw the amendment I had proposed, with the understanding that I may a little later on offer an amendment to the substitute, in so far as the phraseology is concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio withdraws his amendment, so that the question now is upon the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, before a vote is taken upon this or on any subsequent motion, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD, as bearing upon the subject, the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Report No. 545, which was made on April 2, to accompany the return of Senate bill 3607 to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The report referred to is as follows:

The report referred to is as follows:

Mr. Clark of Wyoming, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following adverse report, to accompany S. 3607.

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred Senate bill 3607, entitled "A bill to give the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States to certain organizations or persons in the suit of the United States against the American Tobacco Co. and others," after full consideration thereof report the same adversely, with a recommendation that it be not passed.

This bill relates to a suit brought by the United States through the district attorney, acting under the direction of the Attorney General, against the American Tobacco Co. and others in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to prevent and restrain violations of the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, approved July 2, 1890.

Upon final hearing judgment was rendered for the compainant, and upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States this judgment was reversed May 29, 1911. The case was remanded to the circuit court to proceed in conformity with the opinion and mandate of the Supreme Court. The decision of the Supreme Court held the American Tobacco Co. to be an illegal combination in violation of the statute, and declared:

"Second. That the court below, in order to give effective force to our decree in this regard, be directed to hear the parties by evidence or otherwise, as it may be deemed proper, for the purpose of ascertaining and determining upon some plan or method of dissolving the combination and of re-creating, out of the elements now composing it, a new condition which shall be honestly in harmony with and not repugnant to the law.

"Third. That for the accomplishment of these purposes, taking into otherwise, as it may be deemed proper, for the purpose of ascertaining and determining upon some plan or method of dissolving the combination and of re-creating, out of the elements now composing it, a new condition which shall be honestly in harmony with and not repugnant to the law.

"Third. That for the accomplishment of these purposes, taking into view the difficulty of the situation, a period of six months is allowed from the receipt of our mandate, with leave, however, in the event, in the judgment of the court below, the necessities of the situation require, to extend such period to a further time, not to exceed 60 days.

"Fourth. That in the event, before the expiration of the period thus fixed, a condition of disintegration in harmony with the law is not brought about, either as the consequence of the action of the court in determining an issue on expect the expiration of the court in determining an issue for explored the expiration of the court in determining an issue of the subject of the expiration of the court in determining the movement of the products of the combination in the channels of interstate or foreign commerce or by the appointment of a receiver to give effect to the requirements of the statute.

"Pending the bringing about of the result just stated each and all of the defendants, individuals as well as corporations, should be restrained from doing any act which might further extend or enlarge the power of the combination by any means or device whatsoever. In view of the considerations we have stated we leave the matter to the court below to work out a compliance with the law without unnecessary injury to the public or the rights of private property." (221 U. S., 187-189.)

On the 18th of November, 1911, the circuit court, after hearing the parties as directed by the Supreme Court, rendered a final judgment decreeing that a plan of disintegration of the defendant company which had been presented, discussed, and modified was a plan which, taken with the injunctive provisions included in t

Congress.
(1) So far as any rights which existed at the time of the final decree of November 16, 1911, or which have existed at any time heretofore are concerned, it is not competent for Congress to reverse the action of the courts and direct them to enter an order allowing an intervention which they had already denied.

(2) So far as the assertion of any such existing rights is concerned, such a direction from Congress would be an attempt also to reverse previous decisions of the Supreme Court holding that State attorneys general and private persons could not be parties to such a suit under the antitrust act. (Minnesota v. Northern Securities Co., 194 U. S., 48, 70-72.) The applicants for intervention thus not only were not parties to the suit, but they could not lawfully be parties. The judgment was not a judgment for or against them; it did not bind them or affect any rights of theirs, except, of course, as every citizen of the United States has a political interest as a citizen represented by the Government of his country in whatever litigation that Government may engage.

United States has a political interest as a chizen represented by the Government of his country in whatever litigation that Government may engage.

The sole legal rights of individuals under the antitrust act are contained in the seventh section of the act, which provides:

"Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act may sue therefor in any circuit court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained and the costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

This individual right under the antitrust act was not in any way affected by the judgment of the circuit court.

(3) The only way in which the proposed bill could be effective would then be by conferring a new right, a right which did not exist before. What is the right which the bill proposes to confer upon these applicants? It is the right to invoke the action of the Supreme Court of the United States to set aside, change, modify, add to, or take away from a judgment between third parties, a judgment to which the applicants were not parties, rendered in a suit to which the applicants were not parties, rendered in a suit to which then or determine any legal right of theirs. This would be the creation of a new right of action which did not exist before.

(4) The proceeding upon this right would present a different case or controversy from that which was before the circuit court. Chief Justice Marshall said in the case of Osborne v. Bank of the United States (9) Wheaton, 819), speaking of the judicial power of the United States (1) That power is capable of acting only when the subject is submitted it by a party who asserts his rights in the form prescribed by law, it then becomes a case, and the Constitution declares that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution,

And, in Muskrat v. United states (2.2) and 2. Said:
"Judicial power, as we have seen, is the right to determine actual controversy arising between adverse litigants duly instituted in courts of proper jurisdiction."

The case or controversy which would be presented to the Supreme Court by the applicants under the authority of this bill would be a case or controversy in which they assert their rights against the parties to the former suit, or some of the parties to the former suit, and assert rights which had no legal existence at the time the former suit was decided.

Court by the applicants under the authority of this buil would be a class or controversy in which they assert their rights against the parties to the former suit, or some of the parties to the former suit, and assert rights which had no legal existence at the time the former suit was decided.

(5) Under the bill this assertion of right by the applicants would be addressed in the first instance to the Supreme Court of the United States. It is the action of that court which is to be invoked. The proceeding would not be in any sense an appeal from the judgment, no matter what the bill may call it. An appeal is an application for a review of a judgment by some party to the judgment, some one whose legal rights were in controversy or are determined by the judgment. An application by a stranger to a judgment to have it set aside in whole or in part is not an appeal. It is an independent proceeding.

It follows that the proceeding which this bill proposes to authorize, and under which these applicants would invoke the action of the Supreme Court to set aside the judgment to which they were strangers, would clearly call for the exercise not of appellate but of original jurisdiction by the Supreme Court.

(6) It is well settled that Congress can not confer original jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court of the United States says, in Baltimore & Ohio Raliroad Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission (215 U. S., 216, 224):

"It has long been the established doctrine and we believe now assented to by all who have examined the subject that the original jurisdiction of this court is confined to the cases specified in the Constitution and that Congress can not enlarge it.

(7) As the decree of the circuit court of November 16, 1911, fixed February 2.5, 1012, as the limit of time within which the defendants were required to comply with the plain of disintegration, it appears that the defendants in the suit had no option but to proceed to execute the formative and the property of the combination. On the 22d of Janu

By the said opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States this court was directed to "hear the parties by evidence or otherwise as it may deem proper, for the purpose of ascertaining and determining upon some plan or method of dissolving the combination and of re-creating out of the elements now composing it a new condition which shall be honestly in harmony with and not repugnant to the law, but without unnecessary injury to the public or the rights of private property." H. CERTAIN INCIDENTAL PROVISIONS.

(1) P. Lorillard Co. is a New Jersey company with $3,000,000 of common stock, all of which is owned by the American Tobacco Co., and $2,000,000 of 8 per cent preferred stock. Of this preferred stock the American Tobacco Co. holds $1,596,100 at par, and there is held by others $403,900 at par. Under the laws of New Jersey the present P. Lorillard Co. may be dissolved by the holders of two-thirds of the outstanding stock, and upon such dissolution the preferred stock is entitled to be paid at par, the balance of the assets going to the common stock. In view of the fact, however, that the preferred stock of the present P. Lorillard Co. is in 8 per cent preferred stock; with abundant assets and earnings to make the principal and income secure, it is deemed fair to the holders of this outstanding $403,900 of preferred stock that they be given an opportunity to take, at their option, either cash at par, which they are legally entitled to, or the 7 per cent preferred stock of the proposed new P. Lorillard Co. As the preferred stock of the new P. Lorillard Co. is to be a 7 per cent preferred stock of the new P. Lorillard Co. as and preferred stock of the new company at the rate of $114.25 for each share. It is therefore proposed that the new P. Lorillard Co. provide for an additional amount of preferred stock sufficient to take care of $403,900 preferred stock on that basis, to wit, $114.25 in new 7 per cent preferred stock on that basis, to wit, $114.25 in new 7 per cent preferred stock for each $100 of said stock, amounting to $401,600 at par of preferred stock in addition to that set out hereinbefore. In view of the fact that in the statements hereinbefore made as to earnings of the present P. Lorillard Co. as accrued to the proportion of its stock held by the American Tobacco Co., this increase of preferred stock would increase proportionately the profits of the P. Lorillard Co. and does not derange any of the figures hereinbefore given or given in any of the exhibits hereto and hereinafter referred to.

2. American Smaff Co. determined, on account of fright-rate conditions, to manufacture this brand at Clarksville, Tenn., and to pack it at Menphis, Tenn., and that the factories at Yorklyn, Del., are allotted to produce in Clarksville. Tenn., goods similar to the goods heretofore

This court, having heard the parties as directed by the Supreme Court of the United States, it is further ascertained and determined, and—
Ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said plan hereinabove set forth is a plan or method which, taken with the injunctive provisions hereinafter set forth, will dissolve the combination heretofore adjudged to be filegal in this cause, and will re-create out of the elements now composing it a new condition which will be honestly in harmony with and not repugnant to the law, and without unnecessary injury to the public or the rights of private property.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said plan as hereinabove set forth be, and it is hereby, approved by this court, and the defendants herein are respectively directed to proceed forthwith to carry the same into effect.

The necessities of the situation in the judgment of this court requiring the extension of the period for carrying into execution said plan to a further time not to exceed 60 days from December 30, 1911.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants be allowed until February 28, 1912, to carry said plan into execution.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants, their officers, directors, servants, agents, and employees, be, and they are hereby, severally enjoined and restrained as follows:

From continuing or carrying into further effect the combination adjudged illegal in this cause, and from entering into or forming any like combination or conspiracy, the effect of which is or will be to restrain commerce in tobacco or its products or in articles used in connection with the manufacture and trade in tobacco and its products among the States or in the Territorles or with foreign nations, or to prolong the unlawful monopoly of such commerce obtained and possessed by the defendants, as adjudged herein in violation of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, either:

1. By causing the conveyance of the factories, plants, brands, or businesses or any o device; or

2. By making any express or implied agreement or arrangement together or one with another like those adjudged illegal in this cause, relative to the control or management of any of said 14 corporations, or the price or terms of purchase, or of sale, of tobacco or any of its products, or the supplies or other products dealt with in connection with the tobacco business, or relative to the purchase, sale, transportation, or manufacture of tobacco, or its products or supplies or other products dealt with as aforesaid, by any of the parties hereto, which will have a like effect in restraint of commerce among the States, in the Territories, and with foreign nations to that of the combination, the operation of which is enjoined in this cause; or by making any agreement or arrangement of any kind with any other of such corporations under which trade or business is apportioned between such corporations under which trade or business is apportioned between such corporations, in respect either to customers or localities.

3. By any of said 14 corporations retaining or employing the same clerical organization or keeping the same office or offices as any other of said corporations.

4. By any of said 14 corporations retaining or holding capital stock in any other corporation any part of whose stock is also retained and held by any other of said corporations; provided, however, that this prohibition shall not apply to the holding by the Porto Rican-American Tobacco Co. and American Cigar Co. of stock in Porto Rican Leaf Tobacco Co., nor shall it apply to the holding of stock of the National Snuff Co. (Ltd.) by Weyman-Bruton Co. and British-American Tobacco rehibition shall not apply to the holding by the Porto Rican-Leaf To-bacco Co., and American Cigar Co. of steek in Porto Rican Leaf To-bacco Co., nor shall it apply to the holding of stock of the National Smiff Co. (Lid.) by Weyman-Bruton Co. and British-American Tobacco Co. By any of suid 14 corporations doing business directly or indirectly under any other than its own corporate name or the name of a subsidiary corporation controlled by it; provided, however, that in case or ordered to such subsidiary corporation which are sold in the United States and bear the name of the manufacturer, to bear also a statement indicating the fact of such control.

The only things that have not been wholly accomplished is the disintegration of the American Stogie Co., which is now in progress, the integration of dissolution having been adopted by the stockholders and the business now being in the hands of trustees in liquidation; final adjustment between Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co., P. Lorillard Co., and the American Tobacco Co., with final checking of tentative invoices of leaf tobacco, materials and supplies, and cash to be furnished to them; and making the exchange by American Snuff Co. of the preferred stocks received by it from Weyman-Bruton Co. and George W. Helme Co. in reduction of its own stock, and the exchange to be effected by Mac-Andrews & Forbes Co. of the preferred stock of J. S. Young Co. received by it, in reduction of its own stock. As to these exchanges of preferred stock, they have not been completed because of lack of time, but the offer to the holders of preferred stock of American Snuff Co. has been printed and is to be issued Monday. MacAndrews & Forbes Co. has only a few holders of its preferred stock, most of them resident in England, and letters have already been written them making the offer of exchange.

In England, and letters have

Among the properties turned over by the American Tobacco Co. to P.

As part of the process of dividing the manufacturing properties of the American Tobacco Co. between itself and Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co. and P. Lorillard Co., the holders of a majority of the 6 per cent bonds of the American Tobacco Co. and the holders of a majority of the 4 per cent bonds of that company have each executed and delivered instruments approving the plan of reorganization and modifying, as such majorities were authorized to do by the indenture securing said bonds, the rights of the bondholders in so far as they might be affected by the carrying out of said plan.

To sum up what has thus far been wholly accomplished:

(a) The entire distribution of stocks by the American Tobacco Co. as a dividend to its common-stock holders under the provision of the plan has been completed. This covers not only the stocks held in the treasury of the company at the time of the decree, but also the stocks which it has received into its treasury through the process of disintegration of accessory companies and the distribution of their stocks, in which the American Tobacco Co. participated.

The stocks thus distributed have been largely dealt in on the market in the city of New York, and very many transactions therein have been reported. Between the 11th of December and the 19th of January over 184,000 shares of stock of Pritish-American Tobacco Co. (Lid.) have been reported in the financial papers to have been sold. This stock was never Gealt in. Between the date of the decree (Nov. 16) and January 19 between 17,000 and 18,000 shares of the stocks of Corporation United Cigar Stores have been reported by the financial papers as being sold on the market in New York City. Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the substitute now offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] I think puts this matter in a more desirable position than it occupied under the original bill, but at the same time I think the substitute offered is open to the same serious objections as to its constitutionality as is the bill in its original form. I do not intend to delay a vote upon the substitute, but I have pretty firm convictions upon the question of the validity of this proposed legislation; and, as I intend to cast my vote against it, I desire briefly to put into the Record my reasons for doing so.

I think the proposed legislation is invalid, because it is an invasion of the executive power of the Government, and, in another aspect, because it is an invasion of the judicial power of the Government; and in both aspects it presents a case where the parties affected and other persons would be deprived of their property without due process of law.

I first desire briefly to discuss the question as to its being an invasion of the executive power. The framers of the Constitu-tion provided that there should be three several coordinate and independent departments of the Government. In the legislative department there was vested the power to make laws; in the executive department the power to execute the laws made by the legislative department; and in the judicial department the power to interpret those laws.

When the Constitution confers definite powers upon one department it thereby denies the exercise of those same powers to any other department; in other words, the functions conferred upon these several departments are to be exercised exclusively by the department to which they are respectively committed.

There are only two exceptions, in the case of Congress, to this general proposition: Congress is authorized by certain express provisions of the Constitution to act judicially in impeachment matters and in questions affecting the right of its membership to seats in this body, and it may also act judicially, in a sense, wherever that action is necessary to enable it to carry out any specific authority conferred upon it by the Constitution. It therefore follows that neither the executive department nor the judicial department has any power to make laws; it follows that neither the executive nor the legislative departments may interpret the laws, and that neither the judicial nor the legislative department has any power to execute laws.

I need not stop to discuss the reasons which actuated the framers of the Constitution in making this tripartite division of powers. They recognized, as has been recognized by thoughtful people throughout the world, that the centralization of all forms of power in one person or in one class of persons would inevitably result in despotism, as it had resulted in despotism prior to the adoption of our Constitution. If the Legislature if Congress alone—had the power to make laws, to administer laws, and to interpret laws, all of those various functions being rested in the one body, it would inevitably result in a despotic form of Government; it would result in private rights and personal liberty being at the absolute mercy of an oligarchy.

I want to call attention to a statement made by Prof. Pomeroy, in his work on Constitutional Law. At section 170 he says:

Says:

Sec. 170. A proposition which is thus historically true must have some firm foundation in the nature of things. The possession of power is one of the most dangerous gifts which can fall to the lot of humanity. The tendency is always to its abuse. Power grows upon itself. In a perfect state it is not enough that the rulers at any given time should be perfect men. There must be checks so contrived as to resist the encroachments of authority, which are to be apprehended even from the purest and most patriotic rulers. No other check has proved so effectual as the division of functions into legislative, executive, and judicial, and their assignment to classes of officials physically separate. If the legislature were also judges, their decisions would not be based upon the law as it is; but as it would be impossible for the same men to keep their two characters entirely distinct, their judgments would rather be arbitrary enactments, special measures of legislation for each particular case,

Let me pause, Mr. President, at this point to call attention to the significance of this language in connection with this proposed legislation. Here is a proposition not to make a general rule applicable to all cases, but a special rule applicable to this particular case. Because the general law which we have heretofore passed has not provided for this particular exigency, we are to supplement it by a special law directed to this one particular case and having no application to any other case which has arisen in the past or which may arise in the future.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.
Mr. BORAH. So far as the power of Congress is concerned, what is the difference whether it is a special law or a general law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will discuss that later along. I do not desire to be diverted from the point that I am now on at this time, but I intend to discuss this proposed legislation in its aspect as special legislation directed to particular parties—not even to particular classes of parties, Mr. President—but to particular persons. Now I continue, and let me repeat, in view of what I have said, this sentence again:

If the legislature were also judges, their decisions would not be based upon the law as it is; but, as it would be impossible for the same men to keep their two characters entirely distinct, their judgments would rather be arbitrary enactments, special measures of legislation for each particular case.

And the author continues:

Thus all certainty as to the law would be lost. If the same person or class of persons were to make and execute the laws, the results would be still more disastrous; for, in applying any particular statute, whatever deficiencies in its provisions had been left by the rulers in their legislative capacity could be easily supplied by them while acting in their executive capacity. Thus the laws, instead of being general commands enjoining the observance of general rules, would become special commands addressed to individual members of society. This uncertain and special nature of the law is the very essence of an arbitrary and tyrannical Government.

And again, at section 187, the author says:

SEC. 187. The evils which would result from a substantial concentration of all power in Congress can not be enumerated. Unless our forestathers were wholly wrong, unless the organic law is framed upon an entire misconception of the needs of a free people and of the objects of government, the three departments—legislative, executive, and judicial—must be kept separate, independent, coordinate. The question of the power to be wielded by the legislature was discussed and settled. If the tendencies of the present day are right, then all the framers of the Constitution and the people who adopted it were wrong. Should Congress, as now organized, practically draw all the attributes and functions of government to itself and reduce the executive and judiciary to a condition of substantial dependence upon itself, the next step would inevitably follow, and this would be the consolidation of the National Legislature into one body. The Senate would be pronounced an unnecessary and hurtful clog upon the free activity of the more popular branch. Even now such a step is publicly advocated. Should this result be accomplished, the liberties of the people would be gone, only to be regained by another revolution. Nothing could withstand a legislature consisting of one house, practically wielding all governmental power, restrained by no checks of organization or function. No tyranny could equal its tyranny.

Now, Mr. President, under the Constitution the President con-

Now, Mr. President, under the Constitution the President constitutes a coordinate and independent department. The power which the President wields under the Constitution comes from the same source as our power. His power, the executive power, is just as supreme as the power of the legislative department of the Government. By his exercise of executive power or his failure to exercise it in any particular instance, he does not become in any manner answerable to us any more than if we neglect the duty imposed or abuse the power conferred upon us by the Constitution we become answerable to him. Both the executive and the legislative branches of the Government are answerable alone to the sovereign people which created both and whose power we both exercise;

Now, in the exercise of the executive power by the President, of course it was never intended that he should exercise it alone. It was contemplated-and it arose from the very necessity of the thing-that he should have a multitude of subordinate agents to aid him in the discharge of his constitutional duties. But whenever one of those subordinate agents exercises an executive function he is exercising the power of the President. He is not exercising his own power. He is not exercising the legislative power, but he is exercising the executive power which is vested in the President of the United States.

I call attention to Mr. Pomeroy's statement with reference to

The Constitution declares that the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States. The meaning of this clause is that he is the head of that department; that all its powers and functions immediately or mediately center in him; and that he and he alone is ultimately responsible for their due execution. Certainly it was never contemplated by the Constitution that he alone was to perform unaided all the enormous detail of executive duties which fall to this department. There must of necessity be carried a vast retinue of subordinate officers of various grades and functions, but all these officers represent the Chief MagIstrate. In fact, then, the executive department includes the President as its head, as the embodiment of executive power, and the inferior ministerial officers—the Cabinet, the foreign ministers, the revenue agents, the postal agents, the marshals, the law agents, and the like—who are but representatives of and answerable to the Chief Magistrate. He acts through them; they are his means and instruments for performing executive functions.

Occasionally the question has arisen with reference to the power of the courts to direct a particular officer in the executive department to do a particular thing. The Supreme Court of the United States has sustained in a number of cases the authority of the court by mandamus to direct the doing of something by one of the subordinate officers of the executive department, but in all the cases, so far as I am familiar with them, they have carefully distinguished between cases which involve the performance of a mere ministerial duty on the part of the agent and the exercise of what amounted to an Executive power. In the case of Marbury v. Madison the distinction is stated, and I desire to call attention to a paragraph or two from that case. Chief Justice Marshall said:

By the Constitution of the United States the President is invested with certain important political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character and to his own conscience. To aid him in the performance of these duties he is authorized to appoint certain officers, who act by his authority and in conformity with his orders. In such cases their acts are his acts, and whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which Executive discretion may be used, still there exists, and can exist, no power to control that discretion.

Let me repeat that:

Let me repeat that:

There exists, and can exist, no power to control that discretion. The subjects are political; they respect the Nation, not individual rights, and being intrusted to the Executive, the decision of the Executive is conclusive. The application of this remark will be perceived by adverting to the act of Congress for establishing the Department of Foreign Affairs. This officer, as his duties were prescribed by that act, is to conform precisely to the will of the President; he is the mere organ by whom that will is communicated. The acts of such an officer as an officer can never be examinable by the courts. But when he legislature proceeds to impose on that officer other duties, when he is directed peremptorly to perform certain acts, when the rights of individuals are dependent on the performance of those acts, he is so far the officer of the law, is amenable to the laws for his conduct, and can not at his discretion sport away the vested rights of others.

The conclusion from this reasoning is that where the heads of departments are the political or confidential agents of the Executive merely to execute the will of the President, or rather to act in cases in which the Executive possesses a constitutional or legal discretion, nothing can be more perfectly clear than that their acts are only politically examinable. But where a specific duty is assigned by law and individual rights depend upon the performance of that duty it seems equally clear that the individual who considers himself injured has a right to resort to the laws of his country for a remedy.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

Mr. BACON. Mr. President-Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just one moment. In my opinion. whenever the power which the subordinate officer is to exercise is executive in its character in the sense that it requires him to exercise his judgment-whether he will take one action or another action—then he is beyond the power of either the courts or the legislative branch of the Government to direct him as to what he shall do, and it is only in cases where the authority to be exercised by the subordinate official has been clearly stated by the law, where he has no discretion whatsoever except to obey the precise mandate of the law, when either the courts should interfere or the legislative branch of the Government can interfere.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I think the extract which the Senator has read from Marbury against Madison is undoubtedly not only the law but is most clearly reasoned out by the Chief Justice, but I want to suggest to the Senator that it illustrates the very distinction which I endeavored to draw his attention to last week when the subject was up, that, so far as it concerns the exercise of power by virtue of the Constitution, or where the Constitution confers the power, undoubtedly this discretion can not be interfered with. In that particular case an injunction was sued out against the Secretary of State, if I remember correctly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It was a mandamus proceeding.

Mr. BACON. Yes, of course; but it was regarding a commission the former President of the United States issued and mission the former President of the United States and which was not delivered under the succeeding administration. That is a correct statement of the case. I speak only from although I am gulte familiar with the case. There memory, although I am quite familiar with the case. There the court pointed out the fact that the issuing of a commission was a function devolved upon the Executive by the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the question to whom he should issue a commission or should not issue it was entirely within the discretion of the Executive, and being a constitutional power in which that discretion was a part, and a principal part, it could not be controlled by the courts.

The point to which I cailed the attention of the Senator and upon which I should be very glad to have his differentiation is this: That the Attorney General does not exercise any power which is granted to him by the Constitution; that he exercises no power which is not conferred upon him by Congress; that he exercises no power which can not be taken away from him by Congress; and that these are the two extremesconfer and the other to take away from-and between them, it seems to me, lies all the intermediate power of amendment of those powers.

Now, if it be true that the Attorney General exercises any power that he gets from the executive branch of the Government, if it be true that he exercises any powers delegated to him by the President of the United States, then I think the argument of the Senator is sound, because all of the power of the President of the United States is given to him by the Constitution. My judgment-I may be wrong in it; I have had occasion to express it in the Senate before-is that no departmental officer exercise any power derived through the Executive. If the contrary was true Congress could not add to it or take it away

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am afraid the Senator from Georgia did not listen to the quotation which I read from Mr. Pomeroy, in which he says very emphatically that the power which the law agents of the Government, as well as all other executive offi-cers, exercise is the power of the President of the United States. They are his agents to carry out the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me finish my answer, if the Senator will bear with me. The Constitution itself recognizes that the Attorney General of the United States is an executive officer, because the Constitution provides, among other things, in section 2, Article II, paragraph 1:

The President * * * may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices.

So that the Constitution itself recognizes that the departments are "executive" departments, but the Constitution vests the executive power in the President; and in constituting the executive departments it must be that the Constitution contemplates not that they shall exercise their own power or the power of the legislative department or the judicial department, but that they shall exercise the powers of the Executive, because they are called by the Constitution "executive" departments.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the distinction to which I refer is this: In the case of Mr. Madison, he was Secretary of State, and in the issuing or the delivery of a commission he performed purely a ministerial act, in which he was doing what the President could have done with his own hand if he had seen fit to do so. In the other case there is a power that is created by act of Congress, which devolves upon this officer certain duties which are prescribed by Congress.

Now, to say that Congress can create an officer and prescribe his duties and can not add to those duties or take away from them seems to me to be utterly illogical. There is a very wide distinction between the case of the Secretary of State who, for the convenience of the President, does what the President himself could do

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When Congress passes a law it does not confer any power upon the Attorney General, who is charged with the responsibility and duty of executing that law.

It confers no power whatever with reference to the law. The Constitution confers the power, because the Constitution de-clares that the President shall take care that all the laws be faithfully executed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In just a moment.

Now, what the law of Congress does is simply to create the occasion upon which the power of the Attorney General shall His power is there, and when by a law Congress creates an occasion for the exercise of it, he looks to the Constitution for the power and not to the law. In other words, he looks to the law for the occasion of exercising his power, but to the Constitution for the power itself.

Mr. BACON. There is no such power prescribed in the Constitution. It is prescribed entirely by Congress and need not be prescribed by Congress, if Congress in its judgment did not see If the Senator will pardon me a moment to draw fit to do it. the distinction-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me interrupt the Senator to suggest that I hope he will be brief, because I have a legal argumen to submit, and I should like to present it consecutively.

Mr. BACON. I will not interrupt the Senator unless he desires me to do so, and I appreciate the reasons he urges. I will be through in a minute. I just want to call attention to this distinction: The Constitution vests in the President of the United States the power to appoint an ambassador. The President can not appoint that ambassador until Congress authorizes the appointment of the ambassador, but when Congress does authorize the appointment of the ambassador, the President does not, in pursuance of any power granted by Congress, appoint that ambassador, but he appoints him by the constitutional power he has to determine who will be an ambassador, and to appoint him.

On the contrary, when the Attorney General is created, he is not an officer upon whom the Constitution has conferred any powers, and he has no single powers except those which are enumerated. He has no single power which can not be taken away from him by Congress. If it were an executive power; if, in other words, it were a power which he derived through the President, it could not be interfered with by Congress; it could neither be added to nor diminished.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia furnishes me with an excellent illustration of what I have been stating. The Constitution vests in the President power to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers. When Congress passes a law providing for ambassadors at various places throughout the world, Congress confers no power by that upon the President. Congress creates the occasion for the exercise of the constitutional power by the President. So, in precisely the same way, when Congress passes any law it but creates an occasion for the exercise of the executive power which is vested in the President, just as much as the express power to appoint ambassadors is vested in him.

I come back to the point I was discussing when the Senator from Georgia interrupted me-as to the distinction between ministerial and executive duties, a ministerial duty being mandatory and an executive duty being discretionary. In this same connection I call attention to the case of Mississippi v. Johnson, a case with which all Senators are familiar. I will not stop to state what the case was about but simply to read a paragraph or two from the decision. In this case, in Fourth

Wallace, page 498, the court says:

It is assumed by the coursel for the State of Mississippi that the President, in the execution of the reconstruction acts, is required to perform a mere ministerial duty. In this assumption there is, we think, a confounding of the terms ministerial and executive, which are by no means equivalent in import.

A ministerial duty, the performance of which may, in proper cases, be required of the head of a department, by judicial process, is one in respect to which nothing is left to discretion. It is a simple, definite duty, arising under conditions admitted or proved to exist and imposed by law.

Eurther on:

Very different-

I invite the attention of the Senator from Georgia to this language:

Very different is the duty of the President in the exercise of the power to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and among these laws the acts named in the bill. By the first of these acts he is reculred to assign generals to command in the several military districts, and to detail sufficient military force to enable such officers to discharge their duties under the law. By the supplementary act other duties are imposed on the several commanding generals, and these duties must necessarily be performed under the supervision of the President as Commander in Chief. The duty thus imposed on the President is in no sense ministerial. It is purely executive and political.

They were executive whether the duty was enjoined on the President himself or upon some subordinate agent, as in the case of a general in the field.

Again, at section 641, Mr. Pomeroy says:

It was never intended that the legislature should draw to itself the duty of administering the laws which it makes.

I call attention to still another case, the case of the United States v. San Jacinto Tin Co. (125 U. S., 279). In the course of that case, where the right of the Attorney General to maintain an action was challenged, the court said:

an action was challenged, the court said:

There must, then, be an officer or officers of the Government to determine when the United States shall sue, to decide for what it shall sue, and to be responsible that such suits shall be brought in appropriate eases. The attorneys of the United States in every judicial district are officers of this character, and they are by statute under the immediate supervision and control of the Attorney General. How, then, can it be argued that if the United States has been deceived, entrapped, or defrauded into the making, under the forms of law, of an instrument which injuriously affects its rights of property, or other rights, it can not bring a suit to avoid the effect of such instrument, thus fraudulently obtained, without a special act of Congress in each case, or without some special authority applicable to this class of cases, while all other just grounds of suing in a court of justice concededly belong to the Department of Justice, and are in use every day? The judiciary act of 1789, in its third section, which first created the office of Attorney General, without any very accurate definition of his powers, in using the words that "there shall also be appointed a meet person, learned in the law, to act as Attorney General for the United States" (I Stat. 93, c. 21, sec. 35), must have had reference to the similar office with the same designation existing under the English law. And though it has been said that there is no common law of the United States, it is still quite true that when acts of Congress use words which are familiar in the law of England, they are supposed to be used with reference to their meaning in that law.

Now, mark this concluding sentence:

In all this, however, the Attorney General acts as the head of one of the executive departments, representing the authority of the President in the class of subjects within the domain of that department and under his control.

I can conceive of no more emphatic language, Mr. President, to demonstrate that, in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, when the Attorney General performs the duties of his office in investigating the facts of a transaction to determine whether or not a suit shall be brought, in determining what form the suit shall assume, in determining, after the suit has been concluded, whether or not further proceedings shall be had, whether a motion for a new trial shall be made or an appeal taken-in all those matters I can conceive of no language that could be made stronger to indicate that, in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in all those things he is exercising an executive authority and that authority the power of the President.

So, Mr. President, with reference to the first branch of my argument, as it seems to me, the attempt is made by this bill to direct the Attorney General to perform an executive function, which Congress has no power to direct, but which rests under the Constitution only in the President himself.

Now, again, in another aspect of this matter, I think it constitutes an attempt to exercise the judicial power. The proposition essentially involves a review of the action of the lower court in not allowing the intervention and a review of the action of the Supreme Court of the United States in denying the mandamus.

This case was sent to the circuit court for the purpose of passing upon a plan for the reconstruction of these various companies which would be in harmony with the antitrust law. Such a plan was approved by the circuit judges and certain parties undertook to intervene. They were denied the right. An action was brought in the Supreme Court of the United States, the purpose of which was to direct the lower court to allow this intervention and to allow an appeal.

The bill in its original form clearly contemplated, as it seems to me, an attempt on the part of Congress to investigate the facts and the law upon which the action of both courts was based, and then by a proposed act, which in substance and effect is not a law but an order or a decree, the legislative department undertook to review and to set aside the action taken by the

The substitute as now presented by the Senator from Iowa undertakes to allow an appeal in a specific case named in the bill, after the time allowed by the general law to take the appeal has expired. In my opinion, that is not a law so much as it is a judicial order. It is not a general law applying to everybody, but a special act applying only to a particular case, with the determination of which case the Members of Congress happen

Suppose that the case had not quite reached the stage which it has reached, but that it was newly pending in the circuit court; that a demurrer had been filed to the bill, and the circuit judge had held that the demorrer was well taken and that the bill did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and Congress, learning of that action and being displeased with it, should undertake to enact a law directing the Attorney General to again present the demurrer to the trial court and directing the trial court to again hear it, can there be any doubt that in that case it would have been an attempt to invade the judicial power of the court? Or take a criminal prosecution. torney for a defendant indicted moves to quash the indictment. The motion is sustained. If we happen to be displeased with that action of the court, can we pass a bill specially applying to that one case and directing the court to entertain again or even authorize the court to entertain again that motion to quash the indictment? Can we direct the court below to grant a new trial in a specific case after the time has elapsed?

In that connection let me say that the Senate has had an elaborate statement from the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cum-MINS] of the facts surrounding this transaction, a statement of the law so far as it may be necessary to elucidate the facts, and the judgment of the Senate is challenged as to whether or not this is a case which ought to be again reviewed. It calls for the exercise of judgment in a judicial sense before we can determine whether or not this case ought to be appealed or not. When all these facts are presented to us some of us might think that the lower court had acted properly and others of us think the court had acted improperly; and in that case those who thought that the action of the court was right would vote against the bill and those who thought the court had acted wrongfully would vote in favor of it. It calls for the exercise of the judicial function before we can pass intelligently upon the bill. Now, briefly, I call attention to a few cases.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator goes to the other subject, is that call for the exercise of the judicial power any different from that under which we pass upon the numerous claims which come before the Senate and pass bills to pay them, and so forth?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is a very different matter when a claim is presented against the Government and when we are undertaking to deal with rights of private parties outside.

Mr. BORAH. We exercise our judgment, we hear evidence, we pass upon the question whether or not the claim ought to be paid, whether it is well founded or not, and we exercise all the functions of a judge.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But we do not exercise the judicial function to determine whether or not a court which had full jurisdiction of the subject had acted properly or improperly. That is the distinction that I am undertaking to make.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe the Senator from Utah has given an impression that he did not intend to create. This bill does not involve a direction to any court with respect to the manner of its procedure or the character of its judgment. It only removes or seeks to remove a case which has been tried and in which a judgment has been entered to another judicial tribunal where, according to the law of the land, the judgment below can be reviewed. I am sure the Senator from Utah did not intend to be understood that the bill in any wise directs or orders a court to do anything whatsoever.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; it does not. If I gave that impression from what I said, I desire to correct it. not attempt to direct the court to do anything. The point I am making is that Congress undertakes to say as a basis for passing the bill that the action of the trial court was wrong. wholly based on that, or else there is no reason for passing this law; or at least we undertake to say there is fair ground for assuming that the court was wrong.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest to the Senator from Utah that one of the propositions upon which this bill is based is that the question is so important and far-reaching-it is so intimately related to our legislative functions in amending or proposing to amend the antitrust law-that the Supreme Court of the United States ought to express finally its opinion upon this plan of reorganization. I can easily see how anyone who might believe the decree of the court below is well founded might nevertheless think it very wise that the Supreme Court, the final tribunal of the land, should pass upon the questions that are in the decree.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168) the court held that the House of Representatives had no power to investigate the history and character of a certain real-estate pool then in litigation before a bankruptcy court on the ground that the subject matter was judicial and not legislative.

In McSurely v. McGrew, an Iowa case by the way (118 N. W., 415), the court held that an act providing that any action by any citizen of a county on the bond of the county treasurer shall be void and without jurisdiction was unconstitutional as applied to an action commenced before the passage of the law, because usurping the functions of the judiciary. The court

When action is once commenced, the question of jurisdiction is purely a judicial one, and the legislature should not attempt to usurp the functions of the judiciary by such an act as is now under con-

In Merrill v. Sherburne (1 N. H., 199; 8 Am. Dec., 52) it was held that an act of the legislature awarding a new trial in an action which had been decided in a court of law was an exercise of judicial power operating retrospectively and was void.

I call particular attention to the language of the court in that case. The court said:

A legal process had been instituted in a subordinate court, had been heard, and then they by appeal carried to a higher tribunal. It had been reheard in that tribunal, and, after a motion for a new trial was overruled, a final judgment had been rendered, which by existing statutes closed the controversy forever.

Now that is precisely what had happened here. This case had been before the highest tribunal. It had been sent back to the circuit court. The judgment of the circuit court had been had, and by the law which exists now that controversy is closed forever. Nobody has any right under existing law to reopen it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to understand precisely the position of the Senator from Utah. Does the Senator contend that because a judgment has become final, therefore Congress can not provide for an appeal?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There are some circumstances under which it could be done; but I undertake to say, and I hope the Senator from Idaho will be patient until I finish, because I intend, I think, to discuss these various questions which the Senator would ask me

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, patience is one of my virtues. Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has many virtues, and patience is not the least of them.

Resuming the statement from the New Hampshire court, I Resuming the statement from the New Hampshire court, I read:

The legislature then undertake to revise these proceedings; they convene the parties, canvass the evidence, and afterwards reverse, in substance, the interlocutory judgment and materially after the effect of the final judgment of this court. If these doings of the legislature are considered a mere continuation of the former doings of the courts, then as those former ones were judicial so are these. But if they are considered as disconnected with the former doings, they are still judicial, on account of their nature and effect. The grant of a new trial belongs to the courts of law from immemorial usage. The power to grant a new trial is incidental to their other powers. It is a judgment in relation to a private controversy, affects what has already happened, and results from a comparison of evidence and claims with existing laws. It will not be denied that the consideration and decision by the superior court of the motion for this same new trial was an exercise of judicial power. If so, a consideration and decision upon the same subject by the legislature must be an exercise of power of the same description, for what is in its nature judicial to-day must be judicial to-morrow and forever. The circumstance also that the legislature themselves did not proceed to make a final judgment on the merits of the controversy between these parties can not alter the character of the act granting a new trial. To award such a trial was one judicial net, and because they did not proceed to perform another by holding that trial before themselves the first act did not become any more or less a judicial one.

It is clearly unwarrantable thus to take from any citizen a vested right, a right "to do certain actions or possess certain things," which he has already begun to exercise, or to the exercise of which no obstacle exists in the present laws of the land. (3 Dall., 294.) But previous to the passage of this act. (7 Johns, 494; Dash v. Van Kleck, 5 Am. Dec., 21; 3 Burr.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in James v. Appel (192 U. S., 129), in distinguishing a statute of Arizona enacting that motions for new trials are deemed to be overruled if not acted upon by the end of the term from a statute granting or refusing a new trial, said (p. 137):

The statute did not deal with the past or purport to grant or refuse a new trial in a case or cases then pending, but performed the proper legislative function of laying down a rule for the future in a matter as to which it had authority to lay down rules.

In the Sinking Fund cases (99 U. S., 700, 738), in a dissenting opinion, Mr. Justice Strong said:

A statute undertaking to take the property of A and transfer it to B is not legislation. It would not be a law. It would be a decree or sentence, the right to declare which, if it exists at all, is in the judicial department of the Government. The act of Congress is little, if any, more. It does not purport to be a general law. It does not apply to all corporations or to all debtors of the Government. It singles out two corporations, debtors of the Government, by name, and prescribes for them as debtors new duties toward their creditor. It thus attempts to perform the functions of a court. This I can not but think is outside of legislative action and power.

Mr. Justice Field in the same case (p. 761) said:

The distinction between a judicial and a legislative act is well defined. The one determines what the law is and what the rights of the parties are with reference to transactions already had, the other prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it. Wherever an act undertakes to determine a question of right or obligation, or of property, as the foundation upon which it proceeds, such act is to that extent a judicial one, and not the proper exercise of legislative functions.

In Dorsey v. Dorsey (37 Md., 64; 11 Am. Rep., 528), the court held that the legislature could not authorize the court of appeals to reopen and rehear certain enumerated cases which had been previously decided by the court and upon the rehearing thereof to pass such judgment, orders, and decrees in the said cases as right and justice might require, as being an exercise of judicial power.

There they had the precise case that is here involved. The court said in that case:

Except for special causes, and upon equitable grounds well defined and understood in the law, and which do not exist in these cases, courts of justice have no power to interfere with or to disturb their own final judgments and decrees after the lapse of the term in which they have been rendered. The powers of the court in this respect are no greater than belong to every court of record.

Independently of the provisions of the act of assembly on which this motion is based, it is very clear that this court possesses no power or authority to interfere with its solemn and final judgments and decrees rendered at the April term, 1869, or to reopen and rehear the cases then decided, for the purpose of correcting supposed errors therein, or of altering or changing the judgments and decrees then rendered.

This court is not clothed with any such arbitrary authority. Its exercise would be simply to deprive parties of their vested rights after they had been adjudged and established by final judgment.

Can the legislature constitutionally confer such a power upon this court, or, in other words, is the act of 1872, chapter 310, a valid exercise of the legislative power?

The court then reviewed the cases in which the question had been considered, and, referring to the act of 1872, said (p. 533):

been considered, and, referring to the act of 1872, said (p. 533):

It undertakes to confer on this court the power, at its discretion, to annul and set aside its final judgments and decrees, rendered several terms ago upon full hearing and after careful consideration. If such legislation were sustained, there would be no end to controversics.

By the organic law of the State it is declared "that the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the Government ought to be forever separate and distinct from each other; and no person exercising the functions of one of said departments shall assume or discharge the duties of any other." (Declaration of Rights, art. 8.)

It requires no argument to show that such legislation as the act before us is contrary to the intent and meaning of this article, and is an exercise by the legislature of judicial powers.

Under the act of assembly, if it be conceded to be constitutional and valid, the motion addresses itself to the discretion of the court, and we have seen no sufficient legal or equitable grounds for disturbing the judgments or decrees heretofore rendered.

In People ex rel. Butler et al. v. Board of Supervisors of

In People ex rel. Butler et al. v. Board of Supervisors of Saginaw County (26 Mich., 22) the court held that the legislature may cure retrospectively defects caused by errors in similar proceedings within certain limits (see 20 Mich., 95; 17 Mich., 218); but it can not make valid, retrospectively, what it could not originally have authorized. The syllabus of that case reads:

The purpose of the statute seems to be to avoid the effect of certain decisions of the Circuit Court for Saginaw County, not by directly and in terms setting them aside, but by a direction to the board of supervisors, which, in its effect, is of equivalent import.

The opinion was rendered by Judge Cooley, author of the work on constitutional limitations, and one of the most profound constitutional lawyers, I think, that this country ever produced. That opinion was concurred in by all the justices. In the course of his opinion Judge Cooley said (p. 27):

It is well settled that the apportionment of legislative power to one department of the Government will not authorize it to exercise any portion of the judicial power which is apportioned to another department. The apportionment is of itself an implied prohibition upon its exercise by the legislature. That body, consequently, can not set aside a judgment or decree—nor can it even require the judiciary to give a new hearing in a case once passed upon.

Mr. President, I shall speak very briefly upon the third point that I make, and then I will submit the matter. The third proposition which I announced in the beginning was that the effect of this proposed legislation would be to destroy or injuriously affect vested rights, and therefore and for other reasons it falls within the inhibition of the fifth amendment of the Federal Constitution, which forbids that any person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Now, let us see briefly what the situation is. Here is not only a decree which has been rendered, but a decree which has been, at least in part, executed. The decree involved in this bill became final in January last. Was it not January, I ask the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. The decree became final on the 15th of November.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; the decree became final in November, but the time to appeal expired in January.
Mr. CUMMINS. Expired in 60 days.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; in January; so that here is a case which has passed to final judgment. It is a case which is res adjudicata, a case which, under existing law, there is no power in any court to reopen or to deal with further. Rights which were affected by this decree have attached; property has passed. As I understand, not only stocks, which represent the property of these various corporations, but specific real estate and specific personal property have passed from one corporation to other corporations. The stock of these various corporations has been upon the market, and it has been sold to numberless people. The ownership of the stock and the title to specific property in reliance upon this decree, which is final, which has become res adjudicata, have attached. Can Congress under those circumstances legislate so as to divest those new rights which have attached in reliance upon that decree?

But this bill undertakes to go further than that. Here are new persons who have intervened, new persons who have acquired rights in reliance upon the finality of this decree, and this bill undertakes to confer upon the court and to direct the Attorney General to have a review of this matter affecting the rights of these new persons without even permitting them to be heard, without directing that they may be made parties.

The effect of it is to single out this one case from the whole multitude of litigation in the country, to single out this one set of persons interested in this case and to make a rule applying to them which does not apply to anybody else. It seems to me that such a law is of such an arbitrary character, is of such an unequal character in its operation that it comes within the inhibition of the due-process-of-law clause.

Now, I call attention to a few cases upon that subject.

Mr. Justice Brewer, in Cotting v. Kansas City Stock Yards Co., and so forth (183 U. S., 79), quotes, at page 109, from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, fifth edition, pages 484, 486, as follows:

Everyone has a right to demand that he be governed by general rules, and a special statute which, without his consent, singles his case out as one to be regulated by a different law from that which is applied in all similar cases would not be legitimate legislation but would be such an arbitrary mandate as is not within the province of free governments. Those who make the laws "are to govern by promulgated, established laws, not to be varied in particular cases, but to have one rule for rich and poor, for the favorite at court and the countryman at plow." This is a maxim in constitutional law, and by it we may test the authority and binding force of legislative enactments.

Law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice is due process, and when secured by the law of the State the constitutional requisition is satisfied (2 Kent Comm., 13); and due process is so secured by laws operating on all alike and not subjecting the individual to the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government unrestrained by the established principles of private right and distributive justice. (Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 4 Wheat., 235, 244.)

In the case to which the Senator from Iowa referred the other day, Stephens v. Cherokee Nation (174 U. S., 445)

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Allow me first to finish the quotation.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller said:

It is undoubtedly true that legislatures can not set aside the judgments of courts, compel them to grant new trials, order the discharge of offenders, or direct what steps shall be taken in the progress of a judicial inquiry.

I now yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. Has the Senator any case in mind in which the Federal courts have ever held that Congress has not the power to pass a law to compel the courts to reopen a case in the Federal courts?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That precise question? I have read a number of cases-

Mr. RAYNER. I refer to cases in the Federal courts bearing on the power of Congress, and not on the power of the legislatures in the States. In nearly every State constitution there is a provision that the legislature shall have no right to pass a special law, but there is no such provision affecting Congress; and I should like to know whether the Senator thinks that we could not pass such a law. Take the income-tax case, for instance, or the American Sugar Refining Co. case. Would we have a right to pass a law asking the Supreme Court to reopen and hear that case and direct the Attorney General to retry the case?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I may be mistaken about it, but I have not the slightest doubt that it is quite beyond the province of Congress.

Mr. RAYNER. I have been looking over the Federal cases to see if I could find some inhibition upon the power of Congress which prohibits Congress from passing a law directing the Supreme Court to reopen a case Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Utah that it seems to me he is confusing in the citation just made from Justice Brewer two very distinct things-the right and the remedy. There is no vested right in remedies, and Congress has a perfect right to apply such remedies as it sees fit to work out or effectuate rights. Now, these parties, if the case ever reaches the Supreme Court of the United States, will be tried upon the law as it was then and as it is now, the law which constitutes a general rule for the government of all the people of the United States. I think the Senator has possibly not forgotten but confused the difference between rights and remedies.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No. Mr. President, I have not forgotten it. The distinction is a very well-settled one. Any legislative body, Congress particularly, has a right to pass a law which changes the remedy. Congress has a right to make that law retrospective if it affects only the remedy, but this goes beyond the remedy. In form it affects the remedy, but in fact it affects substantial rights, because this decree is already passed; it has already became final. Now prevene are parties to the decree. already become final. New persons not parties to the decree at all have intervened; they have acquired specific property; they have dealt with this whole subject upon the theory that under existing law this decree has become final, and that they could with perfect safety acquire property in reliance upon it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me first finish my answer. allow me to call attention to a decision which I intended to refer to later-I had anticipated these questions-but I will do so now. The case of Pritchard v. Norton (106 U. S., p. 132), where the Supreme Court says:

The principle that what is apparently mere matter of remedy in some circumstances, in others, where it touches the substance of the controversy, becomes matter of right, is familiar in our constitutional jurisprudence in the application of that provision of the Constitution which prohibits the passing by a State of any law impairing the obligation of contracts. For it has been uniformly held that "any law which in its operation amounts to a denial or obstruction—that "any law which in its operation amounts to a denial or obstruc-tion of the rights accruing by a contract, though professing to act only on the remedy, is directly obnexious to the prohibition of the Constitu-tion."

And so, paraphrasing that language, I may say that any law which in its operation amounts to a denial or obstruction of rights accruing under a final judgment-final by existing lawthough professing to act only on the remedy, is directly ob-noxious to the prohibition of the Constitution.

Hence it is that a vested right of action is property in the same sense in which tangible things are property and is equally protected against arbitrary interference. Whether it springs from contract or from the principles of the common law, it is not competent for the legislature to take it away. A vested right to an existing defense is equally protected, saving only those which are based on informalities not affecting substantial rights, which do not touch the substance of the contract and are not based on equity and justice.

Now I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—
Mr. RAYNER. I would say to the Senator that those quotations refer to the States. Congress has a right to pass a retroactive law

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say—
Mr. RAYNER. One moment. It has no right to pass an ex post facto law, but an ex post facto law is a different thing from a retroactive law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand all that quite well. Mr. RAYNER. Of course the Senator understands it, otherwise I would not ask him. These inhibitions are against the States, and the decisions from which the Senator has read are State decisions; but where is there any decision that prohibits Congress from passing a retroactive law that is not an ex post facto law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, Congress is not prohibited from passing a retroactive law as such, but it is prohibited under the fifth amendment from passing any retroactive law which has the effect of taking property from one person and handing it over to another.

Mr. RAYNER. The fifth amendment does not say anything at all about retroactive laws.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. BORAH. In order to make clear the principle which the Senator has stated, in what respect would this law take property from "A" and give it to "B"?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have been undertaking to state that for some time.

Mr. BORAH. I have been listening. I beg the Senator's pardon for my failure to understand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I know the Senator is acute of perception. Therefore it must be due to my dullness in imparting information. But I repeat that the effect of this proposed law is to disturb rights which have already attached to specific property under and in reliance upon a decree which at the time they vested was final according to the law of the land.

Mr. BORAH. It might be under some circumstances that the principle of estoppel would come in there where parties had purchased under an understanding that certain rights had vested, but certainly the principle of vested rights could arise only under the supposition that in approving that specific plan there were vested rights which should not be disturbed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The due process of law clause of the Constitution is broader than the Senator from Idaho seems to think it is. I will call attention to that phase of it in a moment, and then I shall be through.

Let me complete my citation of these cases. In the case to which I was calling attention when I was interrupted, no vested right had been acquired which was disturbed by the act which provided for a review of the action of the Indian Commissioners by a transfer of their proceedings to judicial tribunals. In that case there was a "mere expectation of a share in the public lands and moneys of these tribes, if hereafter distributed, if the applicants are admitted to citizenship."

In the case at bar, on the other hand, the property rights above described have vested, many of them, since the time to appeal expired.

In Baggs's appeal (43 Pa. State Repts., 512) the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held unconstitutional an act of the legislature which made it the duty of the court, on the petition of any party interested, to grant a review of the account of the administrator and of the decree of distribution entered on the account in a particular case, although the time to take action under the general statute had long expired. The legislature attempted to apply a special law to a named case. Chief Justice Lowrie said .

tice Lowrie said:

There can be no constitutional objection to the commands of the legislature, or of anyone else, to the courts to hear any motion or petition that any party may choose to present; but if the courts are the judicial authority of the land no one has any authority to direct them what disposition they shall make of any case or question that comes before them. And any commands about such matters, other than those contained in the general law of the land, are quite useless, for the courts are by the constitution open to everybody appearing in any regular way. And they hear everybody that comes, though in cases very plain or very absurd they may not hear them long and may dismiss their motion or petition without hearing the other side.

There ought to be no arbitrary governmental dealing with private rights; to prevent this is one of the principal purposes of the separation of legislative and judicial functions in the Government. It is in general guarded egainst by allotting to each department its appropriate functions and by the assurance of the constitution of open courts, where every man for every injury shall have remedy by due course of law. A man's rights are not decided by due course of law if the judgment of the courts upon them may be set aside or opened for further litigation by an act of assembly. That would be a plain violation of the due course of law, a departure from the functions of legislation, and an assumption of those of jurisdiction.

And further along he said:

And further along he said:

Properly speaking, all laws are rules for classes of cases, and never for a particular case or instance. That can be only a rescript, judgment, or decree that decides a particular case, or any part of it, and it is naturally and essentially the result of judicial and not of legislative functions, and comes after and not before the case arises, and after and not before the hearing of the parties.

The case cited does not differ in principle from the case under consideration. There the court held unlawful a bill directing the court to grant a review of an account long passed upon by the court and after the time for taking such action had expired. In this case the act directs the circuit court to consent to the intervention of parties who have no interest and to allow an appeal.

In De Chastellux v. Fairchild (15 Pa. State Repts., 18) the court said:

If anything is self-evident in the structure of our Government, it is If anything is self-evident in the structure of our Government, it is that the legislature has no power to order a new trial or to direct the court to order it, either before or after judgment. The power to order new trials is judicial; but the power of the legislature is not judicial. It is limited to the making of laws, not to the exposition or execution of them.

The pending bill proposes to do this thing after rights have been adjudicated; but suppose that we had put into this general antitrust statute before the rights in this case had attached under a decree a provision that in any case brought against the American Tobacco Co. there should be a longer time in which to appeal than in other cases-in other cases the right to appeal being limited to 60 days, but in the one specific instance of a prosecution of the American Tobacco Co., before any litigation whatever had arisen, the right of appeal being extended to 120 days—could there be any doubt that such a provision would be in violation of the fifth amendment? It would not be due process of law, if enacted before any case had arisen, but here we go further and provide after the rights have attached for an arbitrary rule affecting one litigant, from which all other litigants are free.

Here is a general statute which says that in all cases brought under this statute the right to appeal shall expire in 60 days. Now, after the decree is passed, after the rights have attached, we come in by a special law and say that with reference to this one case the right to appeal shall extend to 120 or 130 or 160 days, whatever it may be.

Let me call attention to a brief statement in McGehee on Due Process of Law, with which quotation I will close:

Process of Law, with which quotation I will close:

Purely arbitrary decrees or enactments of the legislature directed against individuals or classes are held not to be "the law of the land" or to conform to "due process of law." The conception comes clearly to the front in Mr. Webster's definition of "law of the land," which has been already quoted, and it has been frequently repeated by the courts. "Due process of law within the menning of the (fourteenth) amendment," said the Federal Supreme Court, "is secured if the laws operate on all alike and do not subject the individual to an arbitrary exercise of the powers of government." "By the law of the land," said the Michigan court, "we understand laws that are general in their operation and that affect the rights of all alike and not a special act of the legislature, passed to affect the rights of an individual against his will and his away in which the same rights of other persons are not affected by existing laws. Such an act, unless expressly authorized by the Constitution, or clearly coming within the general scope of legislative power, would be in conflict with this part of the Constitution, and for that reason, if no other, be void." "The clause, 'law of the land,' 'said Mr. Justice Catron, when a member of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, "means a general and public law, equally bluding upon every member of the community." In a later case the same court, in order to bring out the constitutionality of legislative classification, preferred to define the phrase as meaning a law "which embraces all persons who are or may come into like situation and circumstances."

Mr. President, I think that this proposed legislation is violative of these various constitutional provisions to which I have directed attention, and I find myself impelled to cast my vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the understanding that we are to conclude the debate on this measure at an early hour admonishes me to be brief in the suggestions which I desire to make. It is difficult to submit such a question with so many legal propositions involved in a limited time, but I shall at least outline my views. No just criticism could be lodged against the manner in which this case was originally tried in the lower court or argued in the Supreme Court. The facts seem to have been presented with remarkable care and assiduity, and the briefs cover almost every conceivable question which could arise. Whatever differences of opinion there may be with reference to the final decree which was entered by the court below after the reversal by the Supreme Court, I think all who have studied this record will conclude that in the original presentation of this cause, both as to the gathering of the facts and as to the presentation of the law, no fair criticism could be lodged against the Department of Justice. It is entitled to commendation for the exceptional care and singular ability with which the cause was presented. I do not approach this discussion, therefore, in a spirit of criticism.

The case as it is found in the two hundred and twenty-first volume of Supreme Court Reports is also searching and conclusive upon altogether the most important phase of the antitrust law. It is known that the Tobacco case presented in a measure a new condition of affairs, and required a new application, as it were, or a different or a more extensive construction of the Sherman law than had theretofore at any time been made. The decision met these new facts and this new phase of monopolistic enterprise without hesitancy or circumlocution, and announced its conclusions in language all embracing and clear to the end that no one may doubt what the law has in waiting for such unlawful combines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Brandegee in the chair). Will the Senator from Idaho kindly suspend for a minute while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 1 o'clock having arrived? It will be stated.

The Secretary. A bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. BORAH. I will read a paragraph or two from this decision-from that portion of the decision wherein the facts are recited showing the unlawful combine. This briefly states the facts and sets forth the reasons of the court for holding this

recited showing the unlawful combine. This briefly states the facts and sets forth the rensons of the court for holding this organization a monopoly:

Considering, then, the undisputed facts which we have previously stated, it remains only to determine whether they establiat that the nets, contracts, agreements, combinations, etc., which were assailed were of such an unusual and wrongful character as to bring them within the prohibitions of the law. That they were, in our opinion, so overwhemingly so results from the undisputed facts, and it seems only necessary to refer to the facts as we have stated them to demonstrate the correctness of this conclusion. Indeed, the history of the combination is so replete with the doing of acts which it was the obvious purpose of the statute to forbid, so demonstrative of the existence facts that the contract and to trade, but by mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by mere exertion of the contract and to trade, but by mere exertion of the contract and to trade, but by mere exertion of the contract and to trade, but by the mere exertion of the contract and to trade, but by the mere exertion of the contract and to trade, but by the combination, not because of the vast amount of property aggregated by the combination, not because alone of the many corporations which the proof shows were unlited by resort to one device or another. Again, not alone because of the dominion we think the conclusions of wrongful purpose and illegal combination is overwhelmingly established by the following considerations: (a) By the fact that the very first organiz

I now read the paragraph which precedes the language just read. While it precedes the language just read, I propose to read it after, as it seems more effective to the point to be made here:

Coming, then, to apply to the case before us the act as interpreted in the Standard Oil and previous cases, all the difficulties suggested by the mere form in which the assailed transactions are clothed become of no moment. This follows because, although it was held in the Standard Oil case that, giving to the statute a reasonable construction, the words "restraint of trade" did not embrace all those normal and usual contracts essential to individual freedom and the right to make which were necessary in order that the course of trade might be free, yet, as a result of the reasonable construction which was affixed to the statute, it was pointed out that the generic designation of the first and second sections of the law, when taken together, embraced every conceivable act which could possibly come within the spirit or purpose of the prohibitions of the law, without regard to the garb in which such acts were clothed. That is to say, it was held that in view of the general language of the statute and the public policy which it manifested there was no possibility of frustrating that policy by resorting to any disguise or subterfuge of form, since resort to reason rendered it impossible to escape by any indirection the prohibitions of the statute.

A great deal of criticism has been lodged against the decision of the Standard Oil case and the Tobacco case; but this much has been settled by those two decisions-that every form of monopoly, regardless of the form which it may take, and every attempt upon the part of individuals to form a monopoly, are prohibited under the antitrust law. It does not make any difference what scheme or combination or plan or device may have been worked out, if the power of monopoly is found within that scheme or device, if it constitutes an act leading to morppoly, it is prohibited under the Sherman antitrust law.

If we ever find a remedial process by which to put into effect the principle of law as announced by the Supreme Court in those two decisions we can eliminate from the industrial world every conceivable form of monopoly and every act leading up to a monopoly.

Whatever others may think, I look upon these decisions as epoch-making decisions, ranking with the great decisions of that court, profound in their learning and momentous in their beneficent effect upon the interests of the people if Congress will only provide a remedial or administrative method by which we can avail ourselves of the principles here announced.

I have read these opinions, or these excerpts, for the purpose of making the suggestion that in view of the principle which the Supreme Court announced and in view of the widereaching and searching propositions which are here found, one would like to know what kird of a decree that court would finally judge to be a dissolution of a monopoly.

However searching and far-reaching the general principles may be, it can avail us but very little if there is not found following such a form of decree as brings about that which the court desires to have brought about—the dissolution of the monopoly. Does not everyone feel that it would have been most wise to have this final arbiter say what constitutes a dissolution of such a combine, what constitutes a re-created condition in honest harmony with the law? In a matter of such vast moment, of such far-reaching effect for good or evil, why should we be content with less than the judgment of that tribunal which decided with such power and effect that this was an illegal combination-a criminal conspiracy?

Mr. President, if all other reasons were laid aside in this controversy, and if all other suggestions were put out of the way, the one proposition of the desire to have the final judgment of the Supreme Court as to what constitutes a dissolution of a monopoly ought to have suggested to the officers of the Department of Justice an appeal to the Supreme Court. The court having announced the principles which it did announce, sending the case back to have the monopoly dissolved in compliance with the mandate of the court, practically invited upon the face of the decision a return of that case for the final judgment of the court as to whether it was in honest harmony with the law or not. For that reason, for the purpose of making it final and conclusive and binding upon the judgment and upon the opinions of the people generally, this case ought to have gone again to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. President, is it possible for us to send the case to that court again? I apprehend that there are very few Senators in this body but would like to see the decree below reviewed by the Supreme Court. We would feel better satisfied as to what we could do under the Sherman law. We would feel that we would have a stronger and more practical interpretation of the decision itself; and, most of all, the decree would become binding and as a guide for the dissolution of the monopolies which are to come under the inspection of the law hereafter.

Assuming that we are anxious to have the review if it can be had, I want to discuss briefly some of the objections which have been made to the bill. I do not say that this matter is without objection. It presents serious and unsettled proposi-tions. But some of the objections we may reject as not valid.

In the first place, of course, the fact that the law is retroactive is not of itself any reason why it would not be binding. It does not render it invalid, and is contrary to no principle found in the Constitution. I am not going to stop to read the opinions generally upon that subject, but I want to call attention to a paragraph or two from opinions where decrees have been involved. I will read first an excerpt from the case of Satterlee v. Matthewson (2 Peters, 413). Speaking of a statute which was involved and which was retrospective in its terms, the Supreme Court said:

It is said to be retrospective. Be it so, but retrospective laws which do not impair the obligation of contracts—

And there are no contracts impaired hereor partake of the character of ex post facto laws-

This is not an ex post facto laware not condemned or forbidden by any part of that instrument,

To wit, the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator from Idaho whether the case he has cited in the Supreme Court involved an act of the State legislature?

Mr. BORAH. My recollection is it did, but I will supplement it with a case in a few moments which did not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me, my suggestion is that at the time those cases were decided the fourteenth amendment was not adopted, therefore the due process of law clause could not apply, and the court simply held that there was nothing in the Constitution which operated against that.

Mr. BORAH. Again the court said in the case of Freedland a Williams, 131 United States:

Many cases might be cited in which it was held that restrospective statutes when not of a criminal character though affecting the rights of parties in existence are not forbidden by the Constitution of the United States. (Freedland v. Williams, 131 U. S., 420.)

That was a case which involved the validity of a judgment in the State of West Virginia.

In 174 United States, Stephens v. Cherokee Nation, the court

By its terms the act was to operate retrospectively, and as to that it may be observed that while the general rule is that statutes should be so construed as to give them only prospective operation yet where the language employed expresses a contrary intention in unequivocal terms, the mere fact that the legislation is retroactive does not necessarily render it void.

That was a statute passed by Congress and involved the question of the review of a judgment.

But I understand it is generally conceded that the mere fact that the law is retrospective in form and retroactive in effect would not render it invalid, and therefore I shall not longer discuss that proposition.

Are there any vested rights here which will be disturbed by this review? If so, what are they? To what vested rights can we point, on which we can place our finger, which will be disturbed by the Supreme Court passing upon the question as to whether the decree below is in accordance with its mandate and in harmony with the antitrust law? Was any right given to the defendants in the court below, which became permanent and fixed and final, not subject to disturbance or review at this time?

The decree entered was to the effect that a certain plan or scheme for dissolution was in compliance with the statute and the mandate of the court. Did the defendants secure from the entering of that decree a right to have the decree stand as against an appeal at this time? Was it a vested right which would not be disturbed by a review, in view of the fact that a law, being retroactive, will not of itself render it invalid?

The Senator who has just spoken upon this subject says that the parties who purchased rights or purchased property under that decree would have a right to rely upon the fact that it would be carried out. Certainly the parties who made the purchase could not have any greater right than the original parties to the decree. Parties who are privies to a judgment can secure no greater rights than the original parties to a judgment. Therefore we may leave out of question entirely the proposition that some people purchased property and relied upon this decree, because it is inconceivable that they could have any greater right than the original parties to the decree. If the original parties to the decree have any right in that particular scheme, which, after the time of the appeal had gone by, could not be disturbed, let us find what the right is and see how invulnerable it may be.

What is a vested right? It may be said in a general way to be the power to do certain actions or possess certain things according to the law of the land; but this is too general to be of much benefit here. Like the phrase "due process of law" or the "police power" and other phrases of the law it is more difficult to tell what it is than what it is not; but one can not have a vested right to contravene public policy or to violate the statutes or laws of the country to do a wrong or an immoral thing. One can not, under a decree of court, secure a vested right to do an immoral act. If a court should decree that a thing. One can not, under a decree of court, secure a vested right to do an immoral act. If a court should decree that a man entering the house by a window instead of a chimney was not burglary he would not acquire a vested right to thus enter the house.

In the case of Baugher v. Nelson (9 Gill) it is said:

When vested rights are spoken of by the courts as being guarded against legislative interference, they mean those to which a party may adhere and upon which he may insist without violating any principles of sound morality.

In the case of State v. Newark (27 N. J. L.) it is said:

Courts do not regard rights as vested contrary to the justice and equity of the case.

In the case of the United States Mortgage Co. v. Gross (93 Ill.) it is said:

A person can not have a vested right contrary to equity and justice.

The Senator who has just preceded me seemed to argue that when a judgment or decree had become final according to the laws and rules of practice at the time there was a vested right in the very fact that it was final; that a party had a right to claim that as it had become final it could not be disturbed because of its finality, upon which he had a right to rely. Standing alone, this is not a correct proposition of law. There must be other conditions. Take the case of Samperyac v. United States. Congress had created a tribunal to determine the rights of claimants to property within the Louisiana purchase under the treaty of 1803. Samperyae had laid claim to 400 acres. The district attorney appeared for the United States and contended that the claim was fraudulent and without foundation in law. A decree was finally entered in favor of Samperyac. The statute creating this tribunal especially provided that unless an appeal was taken the decree of the lower court should be final and conclusive. Afterwards it was claimed that the land had been transferred by Samperyac to Bowle. Bowle afterwards transferred it to Stewart. After the time had gone by for an appeal under the original act Congress extended the time for an appeal or review and gave the lower court jurisdiction to open the decree. Stewart interpleaded and claimed to be an innocent purchaser. Now the decree had become final. The litigation was at an end. out the act of Congress the court would have been without power to exercise the jurisdiction which it did exercise in setting aside the decree. True there was fraud in this decree. But that would have amounted to nothing unless there had been some court with jurisdiction to hear it. And the jurisdiction was given by an act of Congress after the judgment had become final. It is well to remember, too, that here was real estate which had been decreed, and here was a party claiming to be an innocent purchaser of this real estate. Notwithstanding this fact the act of Congress was held valid and the decree was set aside. Among other things the court said in regard to Stewart, as we may say in regard to anyone who purchased property under this decree, that Stewart could have no right that Samperyac did not have.

Among other things, the court said:

It has been repeatedly decided in this court that the retrospective operation of such a law forms no objection to it. Almost every law providing for a new remedy affects and operates upon causes of action existing at the time the law was passed. The law of 1830 is in no respect the exercise of judicial power; it only organizes a tribunal with power to entertain such a judicial procedure.

I now call attention to the case of Freeborn v. Smith, in the Second Wallace. Smith had obtained a judgment against Freeborn in the Supreme Court of Nevada at the time Nevada was a Territory. When the Territory was admitted as a State, the admission act failed to provide for keeping alive appeals or to provide a method by which to perfect appeals in those cases where judgments had been rendered. The result was, of course, that an appeal that was attempted to be taken was of no force The judgment, in other words, became binding, and effect. final, and conclusive. No court had jurisdiction to review this judgment and no method or means was at hand by which to perfect an appeal. The Supreme Court of the United States was without power to entertain the appeal. The plaintiff below was entitled to his execution and entitled to realize upon his judgment. If there was anything in the finality of a judgment that gives a vested right, this party had a vested right to be undisturbed and to enjoy the fruits of his judgment.
What did Congress do? Long after the judgment had become final and after it had been determined that the court was without jurisdiction to hear the appeal Congress passed an act conferring upon the Supreme Court power to entertain this appeal. It not being validated, an appeal otherwise was of no force or validity. I read a part of the language of the statute:

By reason of this act the court's jurisdiction was admitted, which had before been denied. The court assumed to review the judgment which it could not before review, to entertain an appeal which it could not before entertain, and to overturn and destroy rights which Mr. Smith had by reason of this judgment. The precise questions which are raised here by the able Senator from Utah were raised in that case. I read from counsel's brief:

As to jurisdiction, our position is that the act is a retrospective enactment interfering with vested rights. Certainly it attempts to confer on this court jurisdiction to review judgments which by law at the time of its passage were final and absolute. The necessary result of obtaining it would be to disturb and impair these judgments, unsettle what had been previously settled, and compel parties to litigate anew matters already definitely adjudicated. There is no higher evidence that rights have vested than a final judgment solemnly confirming them. Law is defined to be a rule of conduct, and to call an enactment which undertakes to deal with past transactions and subject them to new requirements and conditions as tests of their legality a rule of conduct is to confound all rational ideas on the subject.

Again the attorney says:

The court is here asked to review a judgment on which the law has already pronounced its final sentence. The act of Congress just obtained concedes that the judgment has become final, but declares that it shall not remain so, and deprives the parties of any benefit from it until the matters settled by it are again adjudicated.

This argument is quite in harmony with the argument now being advanced against the disturbance of this decree. The question of vested rights, of judicial action, of finality of the judgment are all raised by the able counsel in that case. But the court, in answer to all this, said:

It is objected to that the act of February 27 is ineffectual for the purpose intended by it; that it is a retrospective act interfering directly with vested rights; that the result of maintaining it would be to disturb and impair judgments which at the time of its passage were final and absolute; that the powers of Congress are strictly legislative, and this is an exercise of judicial power which Congress is not competent to exercise. But we are of the opinion that these objections are not well founded.

Now, is there any doubt that this judgment which the court is reviewing had become final and absolute? Is there any question that the Supreme Court had no power to review it without the act of Congress? Is there any question but that Smith had there something which he had a right to sell and transfer or to realize upon if he could find the property? Without this law which Congress passed a year afterwards could that judgment have been in any wise disturbed or interfered with? Yet the Supreme Court held that the act did not confer original jurisdiction; that it simply enabled the parties to perfect or have an appeal.

What is the difference between that judgment and this decree? Both of them had in a sense become final. In both cases the court was without power to review except by virtue of an act of Congress. In both cases the act of Congress would have to be retrospective. In both cases the lawsuit was at an end unless some additional power was given the court. Here I want to quote the principle announced by the court as controlling in such matters:

If the judgment below was erroneous, the plaintiff in error had a moral right at least to have it set aside, and the defendant is only claiming a vested right in a wrong judgment. "The truth is," said Chief Justice Parker, in Foster v. Bank, "there is no such thing as a vested right to do wrong, and the legislature which in its acts not expressly authorized by the Constitution limits itself to correcting mistakes and to providing remedies for the furtherance of justice can not be charged with violating its duty or exceeding its authority." Such acts are of a remedial character and are the peculiar subjects of legislation. They are not liable to the imputation of being assumptions of judicial power.

Now, what are the facts here? This decree was entered under the mandate of the Supreme Court that it should bring about a condition in harmony with the decision and in honest harmony with the law. Suppose the scheme or plan set forth in this decree still constitutes a monopoly. Suppose it is not an honest compliance with the statutes of the United States. Suppose the Supreme Court should be given the power to review this decree, should find that it still has in it the elements of a monopoly and is a criminal combination, as might well be inferred from the argument upon the facts by the Senator from Iowa. Will anyone contend that, that being true, these defendants have a vested right to pursue that plan and to enjoy the favors of that criminal combination to work in violation of a statute of the United States simply because the time for appeal has gone by? If they have a vested right, a right which can not be disturbed, a right which can not be reviewed in this particular plan; if this decree is indeed in harmony with the decision of the Supreme Court and an honest compliance with the law, no change will be made. If it is not in harmony with the law, if it is in violation of the statute, no possible vested right obtains to pursue it or enjoy it.

I think it ought not to be overlooked that the judgment in the case of Freeborn v. Smith was simply a judgment between private parties. But here is a lawsuit which involves peculiarly the public welfare, which involves a public suit having to do with the interests of the whole people, a judgment which was entered upon a mandate of the court that it should be in harmony with the law. I undertake to say without fear of successful contradiction that the mere fact that the time for appeal has gone by does not give rise to such rights as will not admit of a review.

A few words now in regard to the case of Stevens v. Cherokee Nation. It has been said that this decree or judgment in this case did not settle anything, that it dealt with mere expectancies. Here were parties who claimed to be members of a certain Indian nation. If they were citizens of that nation by reason of that citizenship, they would inherit certain property. The decree which had been rendered by the lower court fixed definitely the status of citizenship. Property rights flow as a matter of right from that citizenship. The statute which gave the lower court the power to pass upon the question of citizenship expressly provided that the judgment of the court below should be final and conclusive. But after the judgment had been established, Congress provided for an appeal. The same questions were raised in that case in the Supreme Court which are raised here, to wit, that Congress was exercising judicial functions, disturbing final judgments, interfering with vested rights. But the Supreme Court said in answer to all this:

While it is undoubtedly true that legislatures can not set aside the judgments of courts, compel them to grant new trials, order the discharge of offenders, or direct what steps shall be taken in the progress of a judicial inquiry, the grant of a new remedy by way of review has been often sustained under particular circumstances.

Are we not prepared to say, therefore, that there is nothing in the contention that this law is retrospective, that no vested rights will be disturbed by a review of this decree? That to enact this law is not to exercise judicial function; that it is not to confer original jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court? Now, what constitutional principle or provision is invaded? What provision of the Constitution are we contravening?

As to this being a special law or applying to special cases rather than a general law and applying to all cases, that relates to the wisdom of the law and not to the power to pass it. The same power exists for the passage of a special law that exists for the passage of a general law. It is a mere question of policy, of the wisdom of doing so.

I am now discussing this question from the standpoint of the substitute of the Senator from Iowa. This substitute eliminates third parties and directs the Attorney General to take the ap-Mr. President, the time at my command does not permit me to go into a general discussion of the power of Congress to direct or control a departmental officer. I want to state frankly that I think it a very close question, one which, in my judgment, has by no means been settled by the decisions. But, Mr. President, we have been directing the Attorney General in matters of litigation ever since we have been a Congress. We have been directing him to act in particular matters. Within the last two years we have directed him to bring a particular action to recover particular property and we have exercised similar power many times. In view of the fact that we have heretofore as-sumed to exercise this power and the Attorney General has acted in accordance with our suggestion, and in view of the fact of what I believe to be the great importance of this appeal, I shall resolve any doubt I have in favor of this measure. If it were a new proposition or if it were a matter of no moment or consequence I should hesitate more upon this particular proposition than any other that has been suggested. But in view of our past history, of the many times we have exercised a similar prerogative, I am not willing to call a halt in this particular matter. I shall vote for the substitute.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not rise at this time

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not rise at this time for the purpose of entering into any extensive discussion of the bill before the Senate. I propose to vote for it, and because of that I desire briefly to state some of my reasons for doing so. In the first place, I have no criticism to make of the Department of Justice. I do not believe that the administrators of that department during any preceding term of our history have been more conscientious or more intelligent and effective in their work than have the present ones. I believe that the Attorney General acted in perfect good faith in the tobacco cases, and, as I have said, I have no criticism whatever to make on the course he took. He did what he believed was right and what would meet the order of the Supreme Court without greatly disturbing business conditions generally; but having in mind the fact that this case is of supreme importance at this time, when the Congress is seriously considering amendments to the Sherman antitrust law, I have believed that in the interest of such proposed legislation, as well as respect for existing law, an appeal should be taken to the highest court and a final determination had by I had felt, and now feel, that inasmuch as the Supreme Court had said that this Tobacco Trust involved all the requisites necessary to an unlawful combination, and having decreed that it should be dissolved, that this court ought finally to pass upon the reorganization. Whether the judgment of the inferior court is wise or unwise, it seems to me that a matter of so much importance should be finally passed upon by the Supreme Court. Being satisfied in my own mind that Congress has power to deal with this question, I feel like voting for the bill, hoping that, through a decision of the Supreme Court, the administration of the Sherman antitrust law and the propositions to amend it, if amendment be needed, may be benefited or aided by such decision.

I realize that this is an unusual procedure and one that ought not to be adopted on every trivial occasion. I do not believe it will be employed again unless it shall be another case similar in importance to this one. The end to be accomplished, the necessity, in fact, of the situation, seems to me to demand that the highest tribunal of the land should decide whether the order of the inferior court is a proper compliance with the order of the Supreme Court. Therefore I shall vote for the substitute bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask if the substitute now before the Senate is adopted will another vote be necessary as in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, the bill will be reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole with the amendment, and then it will be for the Senate to concur in the amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole. Then the vote will be upon the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. And no other vote will be required in Committee of the Whole to pass the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair

there will not be.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I move to amend the proposed substitute by inserting after the word "hereby" the word "authorized," and after the word "directed" by inserting the words "and instructed," so as to read "is hereby authorized, directed, and instructed."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in so far as I am able to do so, I accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa modi-

The Secretary. After the words "simil be," in the second line of the printed amendment, it is proposed to insert "authorized," and after the word "directed" to insert the words "and

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has been accepted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins]. Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I should like to have the substitute read with the amendment, as suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now read the substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa as modified on the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Attorney General of the United States is hereby authorized, directed, and instructed to appeal for and on behalf of the complainant, the United States, from the decree entered in the Circuit Court of the United States in and for the Southern District of New York on the 16th day of November, 1911, in a suit wherein the United States is the complainant and the American Tobacco Co. and others are the defendants, to the Supreme Court of the United States, giving such notice or notices and taking such proceedings as are required by the law and the practice in such cases to effect such appeal.

To enable such appeal to be taken and perfected, the time therefor and for all notices and proceedings provided in the law or practice to be given or taken is hereby extended until the expiration of the period of 60 days from and after the date upon which this act takes effect.

period of 60 days from and after the date spots.

SEC. 2. When the aforesaid cause comes on for argument in the Supreme Court of the United States, counsel for the States, organizations, and associations which sought to intervene in the said suit in the said Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, in order to object to the said decree, shall have the right to file printed arguments and to be heard orally on behalf of the United States, subject to such order or orders respecting the number of printed arguments and the number and length of oral arguments as the court may prescribe.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect immediately upon its passage and approval.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands the situation, the proposed amendment just read by the Secretary is preceded by the proposition to strike out in Senate bill 3607 all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof what has just been read by the Secretary. The question is on that

The amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by Mr. CUMMINS was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was rejected.

On motion of Mr. CUMMINS the title was amended so as to "A bill to direct the Attorney General to take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from a decree entered by the Circuit Court of the United States in and for the Southern District of New York in the suit of the United States against the American Tobacco Co. and others, and extend the time for taking such appeal, and for other purposes.

PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask that the Senate take up Senate bill 2234, in relation to presidential primaries in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill or does he move its consideration?

Mr. BRISTOW. I move that the bill be taken up.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a

Mr. THORNTON. My colleague [Mr. Foster] is necessarily absent on public business. I ask that this announcement stand for the remainder of the day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to again state that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] is absent on business of the Senate. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JONES. I again desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. Poindexter] is detained from the Senate Chamber by important business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. At the conclusion of the morning business the Senate had under consideration a subject; and I ask whether or not the unfinished business was then temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent? My understanding is that when the unfinished business is laid aside temporarily, the word "temporarily" means until the matter then before the Senate has been disposed of, and the question is, Whether immediately thereafter it does not come before the Senate without any further motion, or whether a motion made at this time to take up another subject will not in fact, if agreed to, make that subject the unfinished business? Therefore, presenting the matter as it now appears before the Senate, I ask, if the motion of the Senator from Kansas is carried, will not the subject matter as to which the motion is made become the unfinished business in place of the present unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair it will not. In the opinion of the Chair, when the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside it loses its place for that day as unfinished business unless taken up on motion. A Senator can at any time move to proceed to the consideration of a bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, of course I do not wish to unnecessarily differ from the Chair, but, as the Chair gave no opportunity for an expression before ruling, I hope I may be indulged to say that I very gravely doubt if that would be a safe rule to pursue. I think the suggestion of the Senator from rule to pursue. I think the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCumber] correctly presents the rule, and that is, that when the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, if it is done in the interest of another matter then pending, it would be immediately in order thereafter. At the very outside I should say that it would not go to the extent suggested by the Chair, but that on a call for the regular order it would certainly resume its place as the unfinished business; and temporarily laying it aside does not displace it. As I understand the ruling of the Chair, it was that being temporarily laid aside a measure lost its place.

I do not think it lost anything, Mr. President. It may be that the rule would not go to the extent suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, that the unfinished business would come up automatically upon the conclusion of any particular measure which might have engaged the attention of the Senate, but I have not the shadow of a doubt that it is the regular order at all times, even when temporarily laid aside, and that when temporarily laid aside the matter which shall then engage the attention of the Senate would be displaced by a call for the regular order at any time.

It would be a dangerous rule, Mr. President, that the unfinished business lost its place under such circumstances. It can not lose its place until it has been supplanted or displaced, and a call for the regular order at any time, I respectfully suggest for the consideration of the Chair, would restore it. Temporarily laying aside the unfinished business does not give the matter which has been temporarily taken up any right whatever except subject to the superior right of the regular order, which is the unfinished business

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order was not demanded, the Chair will say.

Mr. BACON. I understood that, but I was a little troubled, if the Chair will pardon the suggestion, by the ruling that the unfinished business was displaced for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In case the motion to proceed to the consideration of another bill is carried.

Mr. BACON. Well, I think, Mr. President—— The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the matter to the Senate. The Chair has no fixed views upon the subject that could not be changed by the citation of authorities.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand the point of order is that if the motion which I made prevails it displaces the unfinished business. do not understand that the Senator from Georgia contends that it does. The motion can carry and the unfinished business may still retain its right. So we can go ahead, as we did the other day, and dispose of this bill and take up something else, and the unfinished business is laid aside until it is called up; so that the motion I have made does not in any way interfere with the unfinished business, because it has been laid aside.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think it extremely important that the regular proceedings of the Senate should be definitely known and understood and observed with care; and I would suggest to the Senator that it would be better if he made a motion to the effect that, in the absence of a call for the regular order, the Senate now consider such-and-such a bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. The reason I made the motion that I did was that it follows the exact precedent of a motion that was made, I think, on Friday last, when we took up a bill upon motion after the unfinished business had been laid aside, and proceeded to its consideration and the disposition of it. The motion is in exact accord with the ruling of the Chair at that time. I think it occurred in Friday's proceedings, as the Senator from Georgia doubtless remembers.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, as I was proceeding to say, if it appeared that there was no disposition to displace the unfinished business and the Senator had asked that the Senate devote the remainder of the day to such a matter, that would be all right; but a simple motion to proceed to the consideration of a certain bill always makes it the unfinished business, That is the general rule. Now, the question is, whether this comes under an exception.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the particular point upon which I desired the ruling of the Chair was whether or not, automatically, after the disposition of the business which temporarily displaced the unfinished business, the latter would come up again before the Senate. If I understand the word "temporarily," as used in a request for unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, that word means until the matter that is being discussed is disposed of. Then the unfinished business comes up automatically and does not require a motion. I can see very easily that if some one follows it by another motion or another request for unanimous consent that some other matter may be considered, the Chair could well hold that the granting of unanimous consent in that respect would be equivalent to unanimous consent to further lay aside the unfinished business; but when we do not ask that the unfinished business be further temporarily laid aside, but proceed to the consideration of other business upon motion, and not by unanimous consent, it seems to me, logically, that it would displace the unfinished business.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from Kansas, it seems to me, is proper, unless those who are opposing it desire to bring the unfinished business before the Senate, which they can do; but they have not done so. The unfinished business is not before the Senate unless somebody calls for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Idaho that, in the opinion of the Chair, the unfinished business, which has been temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent, would automatically come before the Senate provided a motion had not intervened. Now, the Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of another matter, and the question is, of course, whether or not that motion is now in order. The Chair thinks it is; but if any Senator so desires, the Chair will submit it to the Senate so that the Senate may vote upon it. In the absence of such request, the Chair will rule that the motion of the Senator from Kansas is in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think the motion is in order; but I think the more serious question that Senators have in mind is as to what effect it will have on the unfinished business. It seems to me now, with the unfinished business the regular order, that if we take up by vote at this hour another matter, it will displace the unfinished business; and those who are interested in the unfinished business, which is the metal schedule bill, retaining its place, might well be on the alert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that, where the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent and the Senate proceeds to take up another matter, the unfinished business is not displaced thereby, but the Chair will submit that question to the Senate, if any Senator desires the Chair to do so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I thought I had learned this lesson by practical experience. The former Vice President, Mr. Fairbanks, ruled upon this question in a controversy where I had supposed I was safe for the day. The unfinished business being temporarily laid aside, I had assumed that it would stand for the day, but I came into the Chamber after a very brief absence and found that the unfinished business had been resumed on the motion of some Senator. I then complained of the condition in which I found myself, but the then Presiding Officer, Mr. Fairbanks, ruled that when the unfinished business was temporarily laid aside it was subject at any time during that day to call and that it was not laid aside for the day. I have always understood since that time that the rule has been adhered to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the motion of the Senator from Kansas prevails, it will be for the Senate to decide what the effect of it has been—whether or not the unfinished business has been thereby displaced.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if I read correctly, on page 439 of the Precedents of the Senate, we have a ruling that would seem to settle this matter:

Would seem to settle this matter:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Chandler in the chair) announced that the hour of 1 o'clock had arrived, and laid before the Senate its unfinished business, viz. the bill (H. R. 3717) to make olcomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on olcomargarine.

When, Mr. Morgan raised a question of order, viz, that the bill having been displaced by a motion to consider other matter on the previous day prior to adjournment, therefore possessed no priority as unfinished business, and requested that the bill standing first on the order of special orders, viz. the bill (H. R. 2538) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, be now laid before the Senate.

That was the unfinished business.

That was the unfinished business-

The President pro tempore (Mr. Frye) having resumed the chair, sustained the question of order and laid the special order before the Senate as its unfinished business.

Manifestly, Mr. President, even if this matter were taken up by a vote, the unfinished business could be called up after that upon demand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is as the Chair under-The question is on the motion of the Senator from stands. Kansas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes" seem to have it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask for a division.

Mr. THORNTON. May I ask for information, if the vote is on the motion to proceed to consider the bill or on the bill

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To proceed to the consideration of the bill, and then the Senate can take such action as it desires.

Mr. THORNTON. I am willing to have the bill considered. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, on which he asks for a division.

The question being put, there were, on a division-ayes 9, noes 16.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). Mr. President, I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], who is not in the Chamber. I therefore

Mr. GALLINGER (when the name of Mr. Martin of Virginia was called). The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Martin] is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. Poindexter].

If the Senator from Virginia were present, he would vote "nay" and the Senator from Washington would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. Perkins]. I understand that the senior Senator from California is absent on business of the Senate, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. Simmons's name was called). I am requested to announce that my colleague [Mr. Simmons] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when the name of Mr. WILLIAMS was called). I am requested to state that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Perrose]. The junior Senator from Mississippi is temporarily absent on business of the Senate.

The roll call was concluded.

The roll call was concluded. Mr. HEYBURN. I am advised that if the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead] were present, he would vote "nay." I am paired with that Senator, but inasmuch as that would be my vote I will take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I inquire if the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. Stone] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Having a general pair with that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] has a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

The result was announced-yeas 25, nays 31, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

Several Senators. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded, which is equivalent to an objection.

LAND ENTRIES.

The bill (S. 3116) to amend section 1 of the act of Congress of June 22, 1910, entitled "An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands," so as to include State land selections, indemnity school and educational lands, was announced as next in order on the calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, on page 1, line 8, to insert "Section 1"; on page 2, line 6, before "States," to insert the word "several"; on the same page, line 7, after the word "States," to insert "within whose limits the lands are situate, under grants made by Congress"; and on page 3, after line 3, to insert the following as section 2:

SEC. 2. That any person desiring to make entry under the homestead laws or the desert-land law, any State desiring to make selection under section 4 of the act of August 18, 1894, known as the Carey Act, or of State indemnity school and educational lands, or by the several States within whose limits the lands are situate, under grants made by Congress, and State lands in lieu of lands relinquished by the States to the United States under authority of acts of Congress, and the Secretary of the Interior in withdrawing under the reclamation act lands classified as coal lands, or valuable for coal, with a view of securing or passing title to the same in accordance with the provisions of said acts, shall state in the application for entry, selection, or notice of withdrawal that the same is made in accordance with and subject to the provisions and reservations of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted etc., That section 1 of the act of Congress approved ine 22, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 583), providing for agricultural entries coal lands, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as

"Sec. 1. That from and after the passage of this act unreserved public lands of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, which have been withdrawn or classified as coal lands, or are valuable for coal, shall be subject to appropriate entry under the homestead laws by actual settlers only, the desert-land law, to selection under section 4 of the act approved August 18, 1894, known as the Carey Act, to selections by the several States within whose limits the lands are situate, under grants made by Congress, of State indemnity school and educational lands, and selections of State lands in lieu of lands relinquished by the States to the United States under authority of acts of Congress, and to with drawal under the act approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, whenever such entry, selection, or withdrawal shall be made with a view of obtaining or passing title with a reservation to the United States of the coal in such lands, and of the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. But no desert entry made under the provisions of this act shall contain more than 160 acres, and all homestead entries made hereunder shall be subject to the conditions, as to residence and cultivation, of entries under the act approved February 19, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide for an enlarged homestead': Provided, That those who have initiated nonmineral entries, selections, or locations in good faith, prior to the passage of this act, on lands withdrawn or classified as coal lands may perfect the same under the provisions of the laws under which said entries were made, but shall receive the limited patent provided for in this act."

"Sec. 2. That any person desiring to make entry under the homestead laws or the desert-land law, any State desiring to make selection under section 4 of the act of August 18, 1894, known as the Carey Act, or of State indemnity school and educational lands, or by the several States within whose limits the lands are situate, under grants made by Congress, and State lands in lieu of lands relinquished by the States to the United States under authority of acts of Congress, and the Secretary of the Interior in withdrawing under the reclamation act lands classified as coal lands, or valuable for coal, with a view of securing or passing title to the same in accordance with the provisions of said acts, shall state in the application for entry, selection, or notice of withdrawal that the same is made in accordance with and subject to the provisions and reservations of this act."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move that the one word "unreserved." on line 9, page 1, of the bill be stricken out before the words "public lands."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend sections 1 and 2 of the act of Congress of June 22, 1910, entitled 'An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands,' so as to include State land selections, indemnity school and educational lands."

OUTSTANDING INTEREST-BEARING OBLIGATIONS.

The bill (S. 2151) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to use at his discretion surplus moneys in the Treasury in the purchase or redemption of the outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let that go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if he will not allow the bill to be discussed and disposed of Government has never lived up to the requirement of the law, and to-day there is no necessity for it. I believe that if the Senate understood just what the bill provides it would be in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the bill involves a very radical change in the financial system of the Government. The fact that the executive officers of the Government confessedly have been either ignoring or disobeying a law would not seem to me to recommend a hasty consideration of an attempt to make good their wrongful act.

I admit that what the Senator from Utah says in regard to the manner in which they have ignored this law is true. Unfortunately such acts are true in too many cases. They have willfully for a long time disobeyed the law that was enacted to govern their method of conducting the financial affairs of the Government. Now, they would like to have Congress come in and not only enable them to escape from at least criticism for their failure to execute the law in the past but to validate the unlawful act.

I would say to the Senator that, while the bill is short, this is not a question that can be passed over in a few minutes at all. It involves a large question-a part of the financial policy of the Government.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President— Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Indiana. Mr. SHIVELY. It is palpable from what has been stated here that the Secretary of the Treasury, or at least the officer who is responsible, has been ignoring the law with reference to the sinking fund. To that extent the Treasury Department has substituted its discretion for what is the law. It seems to me to be very doubtful policy to ratify that sort of procedure and increase the discretion of the Treasury Department by withdrawing the law in reference to the sinking fund.

Mr. SMOOT. In 1862, on February 25, when the law was passed, the Government of the United States was borrowing large sums of money, and in order to make the lender feel secure

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Objection was made to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over. Any further discussion is only by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not asked that—
Mr. HEYBURN. I insist on my objection.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over, and the next bill on the calendar will be stated.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 256) affecting the sale and disposal of public or Indian lands in town sites, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the calendar.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let that go over. The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 4762) to amend an act approved February 6, 1905, entitled "An act to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' and to amend an act approved March 8, 1902, entitled 'An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' and to amend an act approved March 2, 1903, entitled 'An act to establish a standard of value and to provide for a coinage system in the Philippine Islands,' and to provide for the more efficient administration of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let the bill go over. The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

Krebs, late a captain in the Medical Corps of the United States Army, a major in the Medical Corps on the retired list, and increasing the retired list by one for the purposes of this act, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over. The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 459) to adjust and settle the claims of the loyal Shawnee and loyal Absentee Shawnee Tribes of Indians was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over. The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 2) to cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades, and industries and home economics in secondary schools; in maintaining instruction in these vocational subjects in State normal schools; in maintaining extension departments in State colleges of agriculture and mechanic arts; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure, was announced as next in order.
Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.
The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five thousand" and insert "four hundred," so as to make the bill read:

Parker, or his legal representatives, the sum of $400, as full compensation for permanent injuries received by the said Parker on the 24th day of July, 1909, at Fort Lawton, Wash., while in the performance of his duties as an employee of the United States transport service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 3625) for the purchase or construction of a launch for the customs service at and in the vicinity of Los Angeles, Cal., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The next business on the calendar was Senate resolution 162, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish information relative to sales of cotton to the Confederate States Govern-

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the resolution go over, Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the resolution be taken up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution, the objection of the Senator from Idaho to the contrary notwithstanding. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 15,

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I notice that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Tillman] is not in the Chamber. I am paired with him, and therefore withhold my vote.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to prepare from records in his possession, either those of the United States Government or those of the late Confederate States, and to transmit to the President of the Senate as soon as practicable a list of persons shown to have sold cotton to the Confederate States Government or to have entered into any agreement to sell cotton to said Government, such list to indicate whether there is shown to have been a completed sale or only an agreement to sell and the date of the transaction; to show when possible the residence of the person making such sale or agreement to sell, by county or parish and State, the amount of cotton covered by such sale or agreement, the price to be paid, and whether or not the payment of the agreed price is shown by such records.

that the Senate may understand the view of the department.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to explain the resolution, and then
I want to have that letter read.

In the eighties Mr. John Sherman, by resolution, had a list of names published of persons from whom certain cotton had been seized. It has been published as a public document time and time again, until the southern people have an idea that they have money up here in the Treasury Department to their credit under a certan decision of the Supreme Court which decided that the proceeds of certain property seized after a certain time, under the abandoned-property act, were trust furds held by the United States for these parties.

Last session we passed an act allowing these parties to go into the Court of Claims and bring suit on these claims, and loyalty was not to be considered. They have been bringing suits there in the court. Then the Government comes with some evidence which is found in the archives of the Treasury, showing that these parties have no claim.

For example, John Smith finds in the list of claims furnished under the resolution of Mr. Sherman that there was seized from him a certain number of bales of cotton worth so much. These lawyers here see this report, and they write to Mr. Smith that if he will put his claim in their hands he can recover $10,000 for it. It turns out in many cases that when they bring these suits they find in the records of the Secretary of the Treasury that before the cotton was seized it was placed in the hands of these parties by the Confederate Government. The Confederate Government had no warehouses and no place in which to store the cotton, and when they purchased the cotton from individuals they left the cotton with them. fore the title of this cotton was in the Confederate Government and not in Mr. Smith or Mr. Jones or Mr. Anybody else.

But that is not shown in the printed document. great many of our people have come up here and brought their suit and paid the lawyers two or three hundred dollars, and they find they have no suit at all. We can write to the people who live in the South, after we have this evidence, that they have no claim against the Government, and it would stop bring ing these suits here if we had these records and they knew that fact.

I want to be candid with the Senate. I will state here that I thought the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury was in the report. I intended to have it read. He reports against the resolution, because he says it will give away the hand of the Government. We want them to give away the hand of the Government, so that our people will not be put to the expense of coming here and employing lawyers to bring suits against the Government for claims when, if they knew that they had no ground for a suit, they would not employ lawyers and spend any money in bringing the suit.

That is the case in a nutshell. Our people want to end it. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be read.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I merely want to ask the Senator a question. Does he know of any claimant giving an attorney any amount whatever for starting these suits? Is it not true that the attorneys here write and ask for the claims, stating that they will carry the case to a conclusion upon a certain percentage?

Mr. OVERMAN. They always take a contingent fee-$5, $10, or $20. One man paid $200 to these lawyers. They get all they can out of our people. If they can not get $10, they will take $5. Sometimes they get $5 for every Congress. We ought to be able to show the fact to a man when he has no claim against the Government. I ought to have the evidence to show one of my constituents that he has no claim.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. And if he has a just claim against the Government, it ought to be paid.

Mr. OVERMAN. If he has a good claim against the Government, it ought to be paid. The fact is already published if he has a claim; but if we can show that he has no claim, then we want to give him the information in order to stop these suits.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he can refer us directly to the measure which he says was enacted at the last session of Congress which provided for the payment of these claims without regard to the question of loyalty. I have no reference

Mr. OVERMAN. Congress authorized suits to be brought, and in some of them the question of loyalty does not come in. I do not know how that is; but whether it is so or not, the statute authorized the suits to be brought.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will understand, then, what the Senator means. Those of us who revised the law, or participated in the revision of the law, held that the question of loyalty was not dispensed with. I have had a large correspondence in the way of inquiry since that time.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think there was doubt on the subject.
Mr. HEYBURN. I did not know but that the Senator had reference to something we had overlooked, in which that provision was expressly stated.

Mr. OVERMAN.

Not at all.

Then it is only by implication. Mr. HEYBURN.

What I state is that the Senate authorized Mr. OVERMAN. the suits to be brought.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the Senate did not commit itself on the question of loyalty.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; the question of loyalty is not in this at all. But documents have been sent all over this country by lawyers, and by Senators, too, showing that these men have this money here; and, of course, naturally they bring suit against the Government to recover it; and more than half of them have no claim, because the cotton was seized from parties who held it as trustees for the Confederate Government.

Mr. ROOT. Do not the claimants know it?

Mr. OVERMAN. How can they know it? It has been 50 years since the war. These are their descendants, and they have been misled. The attorneys write to them that they have these claims, and these are their descendants. These men were killed or wounded in the war or they are now dead, and it is their descendants who are imposed upon.

I should like to have the facts, and I know every Senator on this side of the Chamber would like to have the facts. Why should Senators on this side of the Chamber who live in the South be denied this record? It does not aid them in getting anything out of the Government. It is for the protection of their own constituents—to save them from coming here and employing lawyers and going into court. It will stop litigation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, is it not true that the real defense of the seizure is the fact that the cotton belonged to the Confederate Government?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is true,

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not true that in a large number of these cases it seems that the cotton really was the cotton of the Confederate Government, and we have the written record in the department to show that the cotton belonged to the Confederate Government, although in the pamphlet which has been

mr. OVERMAN. That is just what I have said.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The pamphlet contains the names of those from whom it was taken, but the records of the department show that the title was in the Confederate Government. I know of two or three cases that have come on for trial, and the department has produced written records showing that while the cotton was taken from the possession of these persons the title was in the Confederate Government, and therefore the parties could not recover. It would certainly be a relief to be able to write to the gentlemen who are asking us about it, "You need not waste any more thought about these claims; there is nothing in it; the Government has the written record which shows that the cotton did not belong to your ancestors; it belonged to the Confederate Government, and your ancestors were only made depositories thereby. The Confederate Gov-ernment had bought the cotton and you have no interest in it." I think it would quiet litigation and relieve a good deal of trouble and anxiety.

We have all been worried about these Mr. OVERMAN. claims and would like to have these facts. The Senator from Georgia stated the case very clearly. I want the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury read at the desk. While he opposes the resolution the very reason he gives for objecting to it is the reason why we want it. I think the letter is in the papers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary has not the papers at the desk. The letter to which the Senator referred is not in the printed report.

Mr. OVERMAN. The letter was sent forward by myself in a large yellow envelope with the report. Are the papers there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would not be at the desk. That would be filed somewhere in the files of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I sent it here with the bill.
Mr. BRISTOW. I think that the letter should be read before we proceed further with the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will attempt to find the letter on the files of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator from Kansas will bear me out, however, that that was the objection of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes. The reason I opposed the passage of the resolution was the statement set forth in the letter by the Secretary of the Treasury. I did not feel like the Senate ought to take action which the department felt would be vital to the interests of the Government in the cases that were pending.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the reason why I think we ought to do it. He says if he gives out this evidence he will give away his hand; that is, he will give us evidence that he has to defeat these suits. We want this evidence to defeat litigation. Then there will be no suits.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is to prevent suits.

Mr. OVERMAN. We want to prevent the suits. That is the difference.

Mr. SMOOT. Would not this be the result? I understand that the Senator has already had published.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have not had it published.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, the Senate has had published a long list of claimants, showing the amount of cotton in bales and the amount of dollars and cents.

Now, if this resolution was passed and the information is given, would it not have the effect of saying to all the people whose names were included in the original list, if their names are not included in the information asked for by the resolution, there is no evidence whatever against them in the department?

Mr. OVERMAN. That could not be so, because every name has been published, giving the amount of the cotton seized and all the money that has been deposited.

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of that; but if this information is given to the Senate, then everyone whose name was upon the original list and not included in the information furnished, based upon this resolution, will be eliminated, and it will be saying to them, "The Government has no evidence at all against your claim; therefore you have a good claim."

Mr. OVERMAN. Perhaps by elimination that would be the result. I think most of these claims were received.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not a fact that in that case they would have all good claims?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not ask the question as to whether the claims were good or not. I asked if that would not be the

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to suggest to the Senator from Utah that the effect of the present report is an indication by the Government to all that each one has a good claim as it stands on its face. When I read it first I thought it meant that the Government was advising them that the money was due them; that their cotton had been taken; that the Government had gotten the money for it, and all they had to do was to get the statute of limitations removed in order to come and get their money.

Now, it turned out when they began to come here in great numbers, though the Government printed this pamphlet as if it was their cotton, the Government has the written records in a number of instances showing conclusively that the cotton was merely deposited with those people and belonged to the Confederate Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the situation to be exactly as the Senator from Georgia stated it. My question was directed to the Senator from North Carolina for the very purpose of bringing out that fact.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President— Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky. Mr. PAYNTER. I understand the Senator from Utah to suggest that if this report is made and the information is given as to what the records show as to the cotton which belonged to the Confederate Government, when they fail to state that in a particular instance there is no record showing that it belonged to the Confederate Government the department admits it has no defense to the claim. That does not necessarily follow. simply follows that there is no record showing that the cotton belonged to the Confederate Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. The question of loyalty would come up just the same.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not bring up the question of loyalty. I simply suggested it to the Senator so that the Senate might know that the result would be just as the Senator from Kentucky has said.

Mr. PAYNTER. The Senator from Utah certainly does not understand me to agree to the doctrine which he has just announced-that it is an admission that the Government has no defense to the claim. I say that it is not an admission that the Government has not a defense to the claim, but it simply states that there is no record there showing that the cotton belonged to the Confederate Government. There is a great difference between the two.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be true. I have not read the report closely. Mr. BORAH, Mr. President-

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho. Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not vote on the question to take up this resolution, because I was in want of information. But as I understand now, the Senator from North Carolina desires some information which is in the possession of one of the departments here, which information may have some bearing one way or the other upon the claims of parties against the Government.

I do not know upon what theory we deny to the citizens of the country the information which may be in the bureau. The fact is another thing. That the Court of Claims or some other court will determine. But unless there is some reason other than that which has been stated here upon this floor these than that which has been stated here upon this hoof these parties, whoever they are, ought to have the information which is in the keeping and possession of the Government. If the public interests are to be injured in any way or if it is detrimental to the public interests, that is one thing. That has not been suggested. The question simply bears upon private claims and private rights. I do not understand upon what theory we deny them this information.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has the Secretary the letter? The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary has letter and will read it

Mr. OVERMAN. Let him read the letter. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah], before he takes his seat, to the letter, so that he may see the reasons which the Secretary gives.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I wish to ask one question of the Senator from Utah. He seemed to apprehend that the Government would give away its case and that some claimant would come lawfully into his own by reason thereof. I want to ask him if he thinks the Government of the United States had $1,000 that belonged to some man in Utah or Alabama it should withhold that information from him?

Mr. SMOOT. I had no apprehension at all. The Senator certainly misunderstood the intent of my question.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. That was the inference which the remarks of the Senator from Utah carried-that the Government ought not to inform one of its own citizens that it had money which honestly belonged to him.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.
Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. That is the most which can be said in the way of objection to this inquiry.

Mr. SMOOT. It was no objection. The Senator is absolutely mistaken

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I beg the Senator's pardon.
Mr. SMOOT. I did not make an objection. I simply asked the question of the Senator from North Carolina to show exactly what the result of his resolution would be. It was not done in a spirit of faultfinding with the resolution at all.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the reading of the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the letter. The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 6, 1912.

Washington, January 6, 1912.

Chairman Committee on Claims, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been called to Senate resolution 162, introduced by Mr. OVERMAN December 7, 1911, and referred to the Committee on Claims, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare from records in his possession, either those of the United States Government or those of the late Confederate States, a list of persons shown to have sold cotton to the Confederate States Government or to have entered into any agreement to sell cotton to said Government.

The said resolution has a direct hearing upon the cotton claims which.

caused the sellers to contract to store and care for the cotton on their plantations and to deliver it at designated shipping points on the order of the Confederate treasury department, and under such agreements the former owners have been regarded as ballees of the cotton.

Much cotton of this character was thus in the possession of the former owners at the time of the surrender of the military forces of the Confederacy and was subsequently collected by agents of the United States and sold and the proceeds placed in the Treasury.

As payments for cotton purchased by the Confederate Government were largely made in Confederate bonds, rendered valueless as a result of the war, those persons who sold their cotton to the Confederate Government have contended that the sale was incomplete in that they never parted with the possession of the cotton, and, moreover, that as the Confederate bonds received in payment were of no value the sale was void as being without consideration. As most of these sales occurred in the years from 1801 to 1804, it may be observed that the department has no information of how the bonds were disposed of by those who received them, but it is probable that many of them were sold while such securities still retained a marketable value.

Congress, by the act of March 3, 1911, supra, has committed the adjudication of the cotton claims to the Court of Claims and the fullest information as to sales of cotton by individuals to the Confederate Government will be furnished to the Court of Claims from the records possessed by the department as to present the facts pertaining to each individual case, and as section 164 of said act of March 3, 1911, authorizes the court to call upon the department for any information or papers necessary in the prosecution of its business, it would seem that the law sending the claims to the court for adjudication, to be there proceeded in as in other cases, contemplated that the procuring of all necessary evidence from department are cords should be conducted in the ma of all necessary evidence from departmental records should be conducted in the manner indicated in the law and under the rules of the court.

Evidence that the cotton for which a claim is filed was actually sold to the Confederate Government is matter of defense to be offered in court for the protection of the interests of the United States, as required by section 185 of the Judicial Code, and, in my opinion, compliance with the resolution, in advance of the filing of such claims in the Court of Claims, by disclosing the details of the Government's defense against the claims would be injurious to the public interests.

The many controverted questions of fact and law involved in the sales of cotton to the Confederate Government will be determined by the Court of Claims in the exercise of the full jurisdiction given to the court to adjudge said cotton claims, and full information from the records of the department relating to such sales will be furnished to the court in response to its calls made under said section 164 of the act of March 3, 1911.

As the provisions of the law for the submission of evidence from the records of this department direct to the Court of Claims appear to meet every requirement for the adjudication of the cotton claims, it is believed that the specific data when furnished in response to the calls of the court will supply all necessary information as to sales of cotton to the Confederate Government in such form and detail as to present the complete facts of each individual case.

I also have the honor to transmit herewith copy of a communication of this date addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives relative to resolutions of the same general character which are pending before committees of the House of Representatives relative to resolutions of the same general character which are pending before committees of the Speaker of the House of Representatives relative to resolutions of the same general character which are pending before committees of the Speaker of the House of

Mr. President, it would seem that from listen-Mr. BORAH. ing to the reading of the letter-I gathered its import as it was read—that the two principal objections to the furnishing of this information are that it would be expensive and a little bit inconvenient to do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, right there I want to read from my report, as follows:

Besides, in the report of the Hon. Lot M. Morrill, Secretary of the Treasury, of August 7, 1876, Executive Document No. 189, first session, Forty-fourth Congress, volume 14, it appears that a list has been prepared of all the claims covered by this resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am just a little bit sensitive myself as to any bureaus or departments of the Government withholding information to which a citizen is entitled in order to establish a right. We have had a good deal of experience of that kind out in our section of the country. For the last five or six years when a homesteader might be desirous of proving or six years when a homesteader might be desirous of proving up upon his homestead they have been in the habit of sending a special agent, who would gather the facts, and upon those facts the department might see fit to refuse the issuance of a patent. When the homesteader called for the information which was within the keeping of the department, the department withheld the information, for the reason that it might not be to the public interest to supply it; in other words, a man, if he had an opportunity to meet the information, to know the facts, might be enabled to disprove them. Many a man has Government.

The said resolution has a direct bearing upon the cotton claims which under section 162 of the Judicial Code, approved March 3, 1911 (36 Stat., 1139-1140), were referred to the Court of Claims for-adjudication, and as this department is now actively employed in the work of collecting and arranging information for the use of the court in the trial of pending cases it would seem that neither the interests of the claimants nor of the Government would be subserved by diverting the limited available force of the department from the completion of the information desired by the court to engage in the preparation of the data specified in the resolution.

The magnitude of the task suggested by the call for the information specified in the resolution may be inferred from the fact that the records of such sales are very voluminous, and the task of preparing the proposed list probably would require several months' time for its completion, as an exhaustive examination of all related records would be necessary to comply with that part of the resolution which directs that the statement shall show whether the sale was a complete one or only an agreement to sell and whether the price agreed upon had actually been paid by the Confederate Government.

In explanation of this phase of the claims it may be stated that when the sales were consummated the Confederate Government, not having storage facilities for the concentration of the cotton at depots, necessary. In view of the fact that the Secretary has apparently answered the second proposition by his last paragraph, I do not think that it is necessary to argue that feature of it; but certainly, if there is any information here which parties are entitled to have to prove or disprove a claim, the mere fact that it is inconvenient or expensive to furnish it is hardly a sufficient reason for refusing. If it disproves the claim, it does not injure the Government; and if it is legitimate evidence showing a valid claim the citizen is entitled to have it to substantiate his claim.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I merely want to suggest one view of this matter. Nobody will contend for a moment that any citizen has a right to recover any of the money realized from the sale of any of this cotton which had ever been the property of the Confederate Government. Everybody will admit that in every instance where this cotton had been purchased by the Confederate Government and had been deposited with a citizen, that the citizen took no title, and that the United States Government is the legitimate owner of the proceeds of that cotton. It appears that among the list of those in whose names this cotton stood there are many concerning whom the Government has the record evidence that it was not their cotton, but that it was the cotton of the Confederate Government. The simple proposition is, that wherever that condition of affairs exists it will be admitted that the Government has title to the money, and that the party in whose name this cotton appears is not entitled to the money. The sole purpose, so far as this branch of the resolution is concerned, is to eliminate that controversy and not put parties to the necessity of coming here and litigating and then have the Government produce the evidence which, if it is produced in advance, will obviate the necessity of that litigation. That is the whole thing.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his letter states that when the case comes up for trial the Government will be prepared to show this fact, that the court will be in possession of the evidence of it, and it will be disposed of in the manner contemplated by the law; but it does look like a great hardship. Mr. President, that parties who are simply the descendants of the people in whose name this cotton was originally placed and who could have no personal knowledge of it should be required to come up here, Higate about a matter, and have the Government then produce the evidence, when the Government can dispose of the whole thing without litigation by a simple production in advance of that evidence. It is not correct, as suggested by the inquiry of the Senator from Utah, that the production of that evidence will inure in any manner to the benefit of other parties who are not in this class. Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BACON, I do. Mr. HEYBURN, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia what became of this cotton; who took it?

The Federal Government, I presume. Mr. HEYBURN. Well, what did they do with it? Mr. BACON. They sold it.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. And put the proceeds into the

Mr. BACON. They sold it and put the money in the Treas-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Treasury report discloses the actual money which was passed into the Treasury from this cotton that was taken and sold.

Mr. HEYBURN. What was the amount? Can the Senator state approximately what the amount was?

Mr. OVERMAN. It was over a million dollars.
Mr. BACON. I think I can tell the Senator from Idaho, if he will permit me to proceed. I think I can tell the Senator that the total amount remaining in the Treasury-I state this from memory, from statements made in debate years ago, for the subject has been up here frequently in the Senate-is something approximating $10,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Ten million dollars. Was that in gold?

Mr. BACON. I have not finished the answer; I have not given the information the Senator from Idaho desires.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will wait.

Mr. BACON. But I think it is conceded that of this amount, the amount to which the parties would be entitled upon an examination and elimination of this class of cases that we are now speaking of, would be something like $5,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Was that in gold or in paper? Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. HEYBURN. The cotton was sold in 1866.

I know; but was the amount in gold? Mr. OVERMAN. I suppose it was in gold. It was turned into the Treasury.

Mr. HEYBURN. Was the cotton sold abroad?
Mr. OVERMAN. No; it was sold—
Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will confine his views to the particular question I was discussing.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was trying to.
Mr. BACON. I was not going into details as to what all the different defenses would be. Those matters, such as are suggested by this question, would be matters of defense by the Government; those would be matters of adjustment by the courts; but we are speaking altogether of different matters. I was speaking of the question of the propriety of the passage of this resolution, not with reference to what defense might be put up, though what the Senator now says illustrates what I was about to say, that there are other matters to be urged by the Government than the simple question as to whether the cotton had been sold to the Confederate Government. There would be, as to cotton not sold to the Confederate Government, the question which the Senator is now raising in order that it might be determined what amount was due to the owner of the cotton.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I do. Mr. OVERMAN. I want to state, for the benefit of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Heyburn], that this document shows that this cotton was seized in Georgia and sold in New York.

Mr. HEYBURN. Seized by whom?

Mr. OVERMAN. By officials of the United States Government, of course.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I am not now proposing to discuss the merits of the question which will come up on the bill. Those are questions that will be entertained by the court. We are simply discussing this question now, of whether or not, in view of the fact that among this large list of persons who are said to be the persons from whom the cotton was taken, the Government has record evidence that a large part of the cotton thus taken from individuals did not belong to such individuals, but that, in fact, it belonged to the Confederate Government and that they were the mere depositories of the cotton.

In view of that fact, the Government having the evidence, is it not better, when that fact would necessarily control the judgment, to relieve these people of the necessity of coming up here and going to the expense and trouble of litigation, by simply giving that evidence in advance?

If it were true, as suggested by the Senator from New York, that this was immediately succeeding the war, then every man would know, when his name was published in the list, whether he was himself the owner of the cotton or whether he was simply a depositary of it; there would be but little or no merit in the attempt which is being made to get this information; but it must be apparent to everybody that not one in one hundred in that list who was then the custodian or the owner of the cotton is now in life. It was not owned by young men, and only the very young men of that day are now in life. The men who then owned this cotton, or the men who were then the depositaries of this cotton, as the case might be, were probably men in middle life, all of whom have gone.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. They were old men. Mr. BACON. They were old men and men of middle life.

The young men, with scarcely an exception, were then engaged in the work of active soldiering, as were even most of the middle-aged men. The young men were not the possessors of plantations and farms. They were owned by men of riper years, and they are all dead and gone. These are the descendants of those men, who themselves have not the knowledge.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BACON.

Mr. BACON. I do. Mr. HEYBURN. T These certificates would be evidence that the ancestors sold the cotton to the Confederacy, would they

Mr. BACON. Not necessarily-either their ancestors or somebody else.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Well, then, what would that estab-What nature of claim would that show a man had?

Mr. BACON. That would establish the fact that the United States Government was entitled to the money and that those men were not. That is the point about it.

Mr. HEYBURN. That would be a controversy, would it? Mr. BACON. Not at all. If the Government has the record evidence, which I understand to be the case, possibly in each case the bill of sale of the cotton, that would establish the fact that these claimants have no claim and that the money belongs to the United States Government. There is a large amount of money that is shut up in the Treasury which would be released by this thing.

Mr. HEYBURN. To whom?

Mr. BACON. To the United States Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. And go into the general fund? Mr. BACON. Of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is already in the general fund.

Mr. BACON. That money, which amounted to about $10,000,000, has been in the Treasury for 30 years under a decision of the Supreme Court, as I understand; that it does not belong to the Government, but belongs to the owners of the cotton, from whom it was taken.

Mr. HEYBURN. And now they want to get this information as evidence of that fact?

Mr. BACON. Not at all. Those of them to whom it did legitimately belong, of course, want their money, and the Congress of the United States indicated the purpose for them to have it in the passage, in connection with the judiciary bill, of the cotton amendment. I presume that was passed in good faith on the part of the Congress of the United States, intending that whoever was really entitled to the money should have it; but now it develops, and it is undoubtedly the fact, and has been known to be the fact for a long time, that all of this fund does not belong to these people.

Mr. HEYBURN. To whom does it belong? Mr. BACON. It belongs to the Government of the United States, and yet, under a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is tied up in the Treasury, but it is not in the general fund.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President— Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, say that half of this cotton which was seized was not the cotton of the individuals in whose possession it was found, but that it was the cotton of the Confederate States, and that these individuals were simply the depositories of it, this cotton was taken from their possession and sold. Now, nobody will dispute that every dollar of that belongs to the Government of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. By virtue of seizing it? Mr. BACON. By virtue of the fact that it was the property of the Confederate Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the United States Government captured and sold it.

Mr. BACON. They captured the property and sold it, and it was the property of a government in hostile opposition to the Federal Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, that covers about half of it.

Mr. BACON. It has been conceded in the debates which have taken place in the Senate, some of them before the Senator from Idaho came here, that a very large proportion, possibly a half, and I think more, was cotton which did not belong to the parties from whom it was taken, and that the money in the Treasury representing that portion of the cotton, when the facts could be ascertained, would not go to any individuals, but would be covered into the general fund of the Treasury. Now we are simply seeking to segregate that $10,000,000 fund and find out how much of it belongs to the Government of the United States because it is the proceeds of cotton which had belonged to the Confederate Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. Confiscated cotton? Mr. BACON. Confiscated by that fact. If that is so, that amount will be released.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President-

Mr. BACON. The Senator will allow me to finish the sentence, please.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Certainly. Mr. BACON. When that is ascertained that amount will be released and will go into the General Treasury. There will then remain, according to my best information, between four and five million dollars, which will be covered by the provision the House attached to the bill of the Senator from Idaho—the judiciary bill, if I may call it his bill, because he was the principal advocate of it, and he was the one who got it throughattached to it as an amendment in the House a year ago last March, for the purpose of enabling such people as were the real owners of that cotton at the time of the seizure, and if the contention of the Senator as to proof of loyalty is correct, who might be able to make proof of loyalty, to get it.

The Congress certainly passed that bill in March, 1911, for the purpose of enabling such parties as were entitled to this money to get it. This resolution simply seeks to accomplish two things, and it will accomplish two things if it is adopted. First, it will save a tremendous amount of litigation. As soon as this information is published everybody will accept it as a fact, and every man whose name is put down among those as having been simply depositaries will at once abandon his effort to get it. The second effect will be that the money ascertained to be the money of the United States Government will go into the Treasury of the United States Government and only leave for litigation less than half the amount still remaining for parties to prove title to the cotton and loyalty to the Government, if the Senator's contention as to the necessity of such proof is correct.

Mr. HEYBURN. That will be litigated only on the basis that the title remained in the individual and that, if the Government took it, it took the individual's cotton?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.
Mr. HEYBURN. And that the individual would be entitled to recover, with or without proof of loyalty, as it may be held?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. As it may be held. We considered that when we were discussing on the floor the bill to which the Senator has referred; and that is the contention that is involved in this bill.

Mr. BACON. Yes; and the only effect of it is to remove from contention that about which there will be no contention if the facts are shown.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is commendable. I merely wanted exact information in order that I might make no mistake.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I want to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that under the law as it now stands a man can bring his suit and go into the Court of Claims and have this very information certified. The Court of Claims orders the information to be certified. The only question now is whether it shall be certified before he is put to the expense of bringing suit.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think not—
Mr. OVERMAN. In Senate Document No. 23, Forty-third Congress, second session, under the heading "Statement of captured cotton collected in the first special agency subsequent to June 1, 1865, under J. R. Dillin and H. M. Buckley, supervising special agents, Nashville, Tenn., and forwarded to and sold by Simeon Draper, United States cotton agent at New York," I find the following item:

From whom collected.	Where collected.	By whom collected or forwarded.	Bales received.	Bales sold.	Gross proceeds.	Expenses to and at Cincinnati.	Freight to New York.	Expenses at New York, including commissions to agents.	Total expenses.	Net proceeds.
F. A. Billingsley	* Albany, Ga	w. c. Buntz	* 24	* 24	* $2,921.82	* 1 $492.36	* $81.85	* $90.15	* $654.36	* $2,267.45

1 Expenses to and at Apalachicola.

It appears from that statement that Mr. Billingsley had about $3,000 worth of cotton seized. Under the law which has been passed his heirs would want to bring suit for it, but when they come up here and bring suit the Government exhibits a certificate showing that the cotton belonged to the Confederate Government and did not belong to Mr. Billingsley, and his suit is gone. Now, we want to avoid that, so that, for instance, I could say to the heirs of Mr. Billingsley, when they write me to get a lawyer to bring this suit, "You have no suit; this property belonged to the Confederate States."

Mr. CULLOM. Is the evidence there to that effect? Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly. Here is the evidence showing the cotton seized, and so forth.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to make this statement: As I understand, the resolution simply requires the Government, upon the information in its possession, to declare authentically what it does own beyond controversy, and separate it from that to which it does not have a fair claim, which may or not belong to individuals. Is not that the scope of the resolution, I should like to ask?

Mr. OVERMAN. We want the facts furnished as in the case of the items contained in the document to which I have referred.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The point that I make is that there is so much money, and we want to know to how much of that money the Government has a valid claim and how much of it belongs to individuals, although it is in the Treasury.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have Yes; we want all the records. part of them, and if we are going to have part of them we want all of them

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. So as to know what may be litigated for and what may not.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, when the subject was before the Senate in the consideration of the revision of the judiciary title my attention was drawn strongly to this question. I was frequently asked by Members of the Senate what interpretation the committee had placed upon the provision which would govern this matter in the courts, and I stated then, and have frequently stated since, orally and in writing, that the provisions of the judiciary title do not relieve the claimant from proof of loyalty, and it was not intended that they should. It was the subject of long discussion and also of longer investigation on my part in order that I might be justified in the answer which I made. Some Senators now before me have letters in which I go into the matter at some length, eiting authorities.

Mr. President, I will defer referring to the real objection that I had to the consideration of this resolution until I have said a word in regard to the two classes of claims. A portion of the cotton was claimed by the organization calling itself the Confederate Government. That passed by confiscation through the ordinary operation of war to the Government of the United It was taken possession of. That belongs distinctively to a class by itself. The claim was set up that all of that cotton was not the property of that organization, that it held it merely as the custodian or depository for the owners. recollection from my investigation at that time is that, disregarding the question of interest or additional sums, it represented a principal of between five and six million dollars.

Now, the question is, I assume, whether or not suit shall be brought on behalf of individuals claiming that the title to the cotton remained in them when the Government of the United States took possession of it through the act of confiscation. The Government took both classes of cotton and sold it and the money is in the Treasury of the United States. have dealt with it only partially. They have decided certain questions, but they have not passed upon the question as to the five or six million dollars' worth claimed to be individual prop-

The controversy that arose in this Chamber a year or so ago as to whether or not the proof of loyalty was dispensed with is responsible for this resolution. It has awakened the cupidity of a certain class of claim lawyers and also of a certain class of persons who claim to be successors of those who turned in cotton. They think they see a way to open up litigation involving this five or six million dollars' worth of cotton, the money which was received for it being in the Treasury of the United States. That is all this is; it is an attempt to stir up this question, and, if possible, to get a decision from the courts holding that the question of loyalty is now eliminated. They will run against another snag, as they will find when they come to bring suit, as to when the rule applies. If the question of loyalty was a condition precedent at the time the right of action accrued, they will find they have not been relieved of it by any subsequent legislation; but we have not yet reached that. The subsequent legislation; but we have not yet reached that. The courts will reach it first, and we will let all parties take their chances. We will not volunteer as advisers for them; but it is one of the questions that I felt called upon to go into with some care when it was responsibly in my hands for consideration.

Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to leave to the courts the decision of those questions without undertaking to anticipate them here, for nothing we would do could control the decision of the courts in that respect. They will decide the question according to the rules of law, as is their duty, and not according to a resolution of the legislative branch of the Government as to how they ought to decide it, for it will not be the decision of a new question involving new rights, but it will be the determination of the legal status of citizens and the rights of citizens existing nearly half a century ago; and the rule that they will apply to it will be the rule of that day, and not the rule of this day. I am merely stating these considerations. I think they are truly expressed axioms that will follow this matter all the way through.

I objected to the consideration of this resolution because, without any sufficient reason, it has undertaken to express on its face a recognition of the Confederate Government. There never was a Confederate Government, and we have the best authority in the world for that statement, and I desire to put it in the RECORD. I have all the decisions here. There are too many of them to undertake to read into the RECORD, but the question came squarely face to face with the Supreme Court of the United States for the purpose of decision where the decision of that question determined the rights of the parties. It was not obiter; it was not incidental; it was a decision of that court in a case of conflicting interests and rights, and it was rendered by one of the Justices of the United States Supreme Court whose record is, perhaps, as good as that of anyone who ever sat on it. He represented us not only in the Supreme Court of the United States, but in great international controversies and tribunals, and he stands not only as a great jurist in this country but as a great jurist in all the world. I refer to Mr. Justice Swayne. His decision was rendered long enough after the war for cooling time to have elapsed. The question grew out of an action by the so-called Confederate Government in the creation of courts and the establishment of their juris-The decision is in Ninth Wallace, and I read it, not diction. because Senators do not know it or have forgotten it, but in order that it may accompany my remarks in this Record that will stand forever. He discusses the status of what was claimed to be the Confederate Government. In the resolution under consideration (S. Res. 162) the language used is "the Confederate States Government." The question in my mind is, Are we going to give it official recognition in the Senate of the United States? The court says:

United States? The court says:

The rebellion out of which the war grew was without any legal sanction. In the eye of the law, it had the same properties as if it had been the insurrection of a county or smaller municipal territory against the State to which it belonged. The proportions and duration of the struggle did not affect its character. Nor was there a rebel government de facto in such a sense as to give any legal efficacy to its acts. It was not recognized by the National, nor by any foreign Government. It was not at any time in possession of the capital of the Nation. It did not for a moment displace the rightful government. That government was always in existence, always in the regular discharge of its functions, and constantly exercising all its military power to put down the resistance to its authority in the insurrectionary States. The union of the States, for all the purposes of the Constitution, is as perfect and indissoluble as the union of the integral parts of the States themselves; and nothing but revolutionary violence can, in either case, destroy the ties which hold the parts together. For the sake of humanity, certain belligerent rights were conceded to the insurgents in arms. But the recognition did not extend to the pretended Government of the Confederacy.

That sounds like the patriotism of my early life, the echo of

That sounds like the patriotism of my early life, the echo of which has been ringing in my ears all through. Mr. President, there are more than a dozen decisions in exact accord with the expression of Mr. Justice Swayne upon this question. Now, with what propriety can Congress to-day incorporate into its responsible action a recognition of the existence of the Confederate States Government. I appeal in the name of reason and consistency whether or not you ought to accept such a thing.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is merely a designation. It only designates the records as they are designated in the department itself.

That is all it is.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I must differ from the Senator. personal conversation the Senator has so maintained and does now on the floor, but you would have to rewrite this resolution to make it susceptible of such an interpretation. It reads:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Trasury be, and he is hereby, directed to prepare from records in his possession, either those of the United States Government or those of the late Confederate States, and to transmit to the President of the Senate as soon as practicable a list of persons shown to have sold cotton to the Confederate States Government.

Now, if you leave off the word "Government" you come pretty nearly describing those States. They were confederated together for the purpose of disrupting the Union.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to striking it out. Mr. HEYBURN. And the words "Confederate States" there would be less objectionable.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to striking out the word "Government."

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment. It was the use of that word "Government" that first took me to the Senator's desk to protest, and it was the use of that word "Government" that caused me to object to the consideration of this resolution to-day.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. BACON. Of course, I do not want to go into any argument upon this question. If the name of that government were used, the Senator might object to the recognition of it; but that was not the name of it. It was the Confederate States of America, just like the name of our Government is the United States of America. It undoubtedly was a government, and you have to designate it some way.

Mr. HEYBURN. The courts say not.

Mr. BACON. A government is something which governs, and there was something which governed a large territory and maintained armies and fought a great war, the greatest of modern times, for four years.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Supreme Court says it was not a government.

Mr. BACON. I do not want to split hairs with the Senator about that and I do not want ever to enter into any discussion of that question. I think the country is pretty well satisfied about the whole thing, one way and another. I do not think there is anything to be gained by the discussion, but I thought possibly that the suggestion to the Senator that the name that he so much objects to in this resolution is not the name of that government might cause him to view the matter differently.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is so described. There was no govern-ent. The Supreme Court says there was none; and I know the Senator is a great lawyer and reverences the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BACON. In one sense the Supreme Court could say that and in another sense it could not; but I just want to ask the Senator this question: Under what title would the United States Government be entitled to this $5,000,000 that I say is in the Treasury now?

Mr. HEYBURN. Because they took it from the insurgents. Mr. BACON. Well, but there must have been an organization from which it could be taken.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, the organization-I hope the Senator will not force me to be too particular in naming that organization. I used to content myself-

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to the Senator using it; but I simply say to him that the Senate itself has by solemn vote condemned it in the past.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is not pleasant for me to rise in my place in this body and seem even to refer to unpleasant things.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I will interrupt him so far as to say that I acknowledge my error in making any reply to him whatsoever, and-

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not yield for that. That was not intended to be courteous, and I am not one of those who stand discourtesy here or elsewhere. Senators might just as well make up their minds on that. If Senators can content themselves with a courteous discussion of these questions, well and good; but I am going to speak of them from my standpoint. I speak with responsibility, and when a Senator attempts to say in a contemptuous way that he made a mistake by replying to me he will find that he has made no mistake by replying.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I will try to be in order by being silent

Mr. HEYBURN. I will enforce courtesy to myself here or anywhere against any man or men on earth. Just mark that down; and I know how to do it, too. Now, Mr. President, I will resume

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.
Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose we strike out the word "Government" and say the "Confederate States."
Mr. HEYBURN. That was the suggestion I made to the Senator when the matter first came to my attention, and the Senator said he would, but afterwards suggested that he thought he would not.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I think the Senator misunderstood me.

However, I will take the suggestion back.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, that resolves itself down to its merits. Mr. OVERMAN. I am not offering to amend the resolution at all. I will strike nothing out, but will just leave it to the Senate and have it passed on by them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then the Senator is contending for it.

Whatever we put up to the Senate we contend for.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I never have contended for it, except that it was the proper way to designate the records; that is all.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it has got to be that I retain the liberty to stand up for the loyalty of the citizenship of this country, but I will not apologize for the acts of the great majority of the patriotic people in suppressing the rebellion. The Senator says he is not going to withdraw that word. I will just set that off against it, and if the majority of the Senate dare, by the language of that resolution, recognize that there ever was a Confederate Government, they will find enough patriotism in this country to make them think that they had better give it more attention.

I suppose they would get up a direct primary. I think probably that would be their last resort. They would submit this to a direct primary, as they are submitting other questions.

I would not have given more than the passing attention that I give to all measures to the resolution had not those words obtruded themselves upon my notice on the face of the resolu-tion. They occur twice. They occur in line 6 and in lines 7 and 8, where reference is made to "said Government."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire? Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 6, I move to strike out the word Government."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 8, I move to strike out "Government" and substitute the words "Confederate States."

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. OVERMAN. Since that has been done I want to direct the Senator's attention-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield if the Senator desires— Mr. OVERMAN. I merely want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, say:

Mr. HEYBURN. The Secretary of the Treasury speaks of many things that, in my judgment, are admirably spoken,

Mr. OVERMAN. I wanted to show that these words appear in the letter

Mr. HEYBURN. I know what has been read into the RECORD. Mr. OVERMAN (reading):

Records in his possession, either those of the United States Government or those of the late Confederate States, a list of persons shown to have sold cotton to the Confederate States Government or to have entered into any agreement to sell cotton to said Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. I never did take my patriotism from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and I am not apt to commence in this debate. But I am not going to animad-vert further upon his views of these questions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

INSTRUCTION IN FORESTRY.

The bill (S. 5076) to promote instruction in forestry in States and Territories which contain national forests was announced as next in order on the calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

WAIVER OF TRIAL BY JURY.

The bill (S. 3846) to authorize a waiver of trial by jury in the district courts of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over. The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

Mr. CHILTON. I did not understand what Senator asked that Senate bill 3846 be passed over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I asked that it should go over, not noticing the Senator from West Virginia in his seat. I have no desire to insist on its going over.

Mr. CHILTON. It is a bill of great public importance

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdraw my objection, but I should like to have the Senator make a brief statement about the bill.

It seems to waive trial by jury. I do not know its exact signifi-

Mr. CHILTON. The object of the bill is simply this: Section 649 of the Revised Statutes provides that civil cases in the circuit courts may be tried without a jury, and then provides how a jury shall be waived. Section 700 of the Revised Statutes how a jury shall be walved. Section 100 of the Revised Statutes provides how appeals on writs of error may be taken in cases where a jury has been waived by stipulation of the parties.

Those two sections relate to circuit courts. The circuit courts having been abolished, and all trials by jury in the first instance being now in the district courts, the bill substitutes in those two sections the words "district courts" for "circuit courts."

There has been some question as to whether the judicial codification does not provide for it, but some of the judges hold one way and some the other. It was at the instance of several district judges that the bill was introduced and finally reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

If the present law by construction would operate as the bill is intended to do, the bill can not hurt anything. The bill was prepared and introduced and reported by the Judiciary Committee for safety. It embodies those two sections for sections 649 and 700, and strikes out the words "circuit courts" and inserts "district courts."

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdraw my objection, Mr. President.
There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.
The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 2234) to provide for a primary nominating election in the District of Columbia, at which the qualified electors of the said District shall have the opportunity to vote for their first and second choice among those aspiring to be candidates of their respective political parties for President and Vice President of the United States, to elect their party delegates to their national conventions, and to elect their national committeemen, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over. The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

EL PASO & SOUTHWESTERN RAILROAD.

The bill (H. R. 21170) granting to the El Paso & Southwestern Railroad Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the Territory and State of Arizona, a right of way through the Fort Huachuca Military Reservation in the State of Arizona, and authorizing said corporation and its successors or assigns to construct and operate a railway through said Fort Huachuca Military Reservation, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOANS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.
Mr. CURTIS. There are quite a number of bills on the calendar. A very important bill is the bill (H. R. 8768) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia. It has been on the calendar for a long time. It is only 4 o'clock, and that bill would soon be reached in order on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. We have been here since 11 o'clock this morning. I understand that a number of Senators have already made appointment for committee meetings thinking that we would adjourn by 4 o'clock.

Mr. CURTIS. I give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the report of the conferees on House joint resolution 39 has been disposed of, I will move to take up House bill 8768.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, there being, on a division, ayes 21, noes 7, and (at 3 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 23, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, April 22, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almightly God, our heavenly Father, let Thy spirit come mightily upon us, to strengthen, encourage, and guide us in our struggles to attain the ideals that each is bound to contribute to his fellows, to the public weal, to the uplift of humanity, if Thy kingdom shall come and Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Hear us and help us to answer our prayer. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to concur in the Senate amendments to the House bill 18336.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill and the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, where is the bill? The SPEAKER. The bill is in the hands of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

H.R. 18336. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldlers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldlers and sailors of said war.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause,] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Rus-SELL] moves to concur in the Senate amendments. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BINGHAM.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. Moore of Pennsylvania, it was-Ordered, That Sunday, the 19th day of May, at 12 o'clock m., be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. HENRY H. BINGHAM, late a Representative from the State of I'ennsylvania.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. Fuller, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of George W. Marston, Sixty-first Congress (H. R. 3794), without leaving copies, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 16101. An act providing for patents to homesteads on the ceded portion of the Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming. NORWEGIAN ICE BREAKER "KIT."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file the views of the minority (H. Rept. 523, pt. 2) on the bill (H. R. 17235) to grant American registry to the Norwegian ice breaker Kit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asks unanimous consent to file the views of the minority on the bill H. R. 17235. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unant-mous consent to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, for some weeks Col. Roosevelt, a receptive candidate for a third-term nomination for the Presidency, has been taking occasion to flay me before the American people. He did this in a letter to Senator Dixon, which he gave to the press before he mailed it to the Senator. He did this in his Carnegie Hall speech and in his tours throughout the country.

In his recent western trip he continued to assail me, not only in other States, but in my home State. He began early in the morning and continued through his 18 or 20 speeches in Kansas to make me the principal subject of his speeches.

I am not a candidate, not even a receptive candidate, for the Presidency. [Applause.] I am a candidate for membership in this House. Col. Roosevelt's grievance against me arises from the fact that at Concord, N. H., some weeks ago I took occasion to expose the absolute absurdity of his proposal to appeal from the decision of the court to the crowd in the courthouse vard.

In order to make it so plain that it could be easily understood as to what the colonel was proposing or had proposed in his Columbus speech, I declared that such an appeal as he proposed was like appealing from the umpire to the bleachers in a ball game. The colonel, in his letter to Senator Dixon, in his Carnegie Hall speech, and elsewhere, assumes, like an artful politician, that I was not talking about his proposal as to judicial decisions when I referred to the appeal from the umpire to the bleachers, but about the game of politics in which he is now so intensely interested. In his Kansas speeches he has done the same thing. I will read samples of what comes to me in the press this morning.

ROOSEVELT RACING THROUGH KANSAS—BY SPECIAL TRAIN HE CROSSES STATE, NORTH TO SOUTH--JABS CAMPBELL AS HE GORS—HIS SPEECHES, AS USUAL, MORE INGENIOUS THAN FAIR—CHARGES CONGRESAMAN WITH MEANING WHAT HE NEVER DID, THEN DEMOLISHES HIS ARGUMENT.

[By the Associated Press.]

MANHATTAN, KANS., April 19, 2912.

In his speeches to-day en route across Kansas Col. Roosevelt repeatedly assailed Congressman CAMPBELL. CAMPBELL, he said, had visited New Hampshire as a "sort of perverted missionary," and there had referred to Roosevelt's judiciary proposal as an "appeal from the umpire to the bleachers."

"Mr. CAMPBELL showed he was wholly ignorant of the foundation of this Government." he said. "Mr. CAMPBELL felt that the attitude of the people in reference to politics ought to be that they sat on the bleachers and paid the price of admission, but had nothing to do with the game. I ask you in Kansas to stand by us because we stand by the bleachers.

"We have appealed in this campaign to the bleachers. We appealed to them in Illinois and Pennsylvania, and the bleachers went with us.

Here is another:

Col. Roosevelt assails Congressman Campbell, telling the people that their fellow Kansan made a mistake when he said the colonel's proposition for a recall of judical decisions was like an appeal from the umpire to the bleachers. He deciared that Mr. Campbell, in effect, had said that he believed the people were unfit to manage their own affairs, but that he himself had appealed to the bleachers in Illinois and Pennsylvania and had won.

Mr. Speaker, it is reported in the press that these statements were made not by a pettifogging politician in ward politics but by a candidate for the Presidency of the United States, the most exalted position in all the world. In one breath he says I was talking about his proposal to appeal from judicial decisions to a popular vote and his only answer is in the next breath when he declares that he appealed to the bleachers, and won in Illinois and Pennsylvania. If his conception of the judicial function is that it is like a campaign for votes, he has underestimated the intelligence of the people of Kansas if he believes they have no higher conception of the judicial office. [Applause.]

In the Concord speech I discussed the colonel's Columbus speech, giving particular attention to that portion of it in which he favored an appeal to a popular vote on constitutional questions I had good authority for making criticism of the absurd proposition made by the colonel, and I take some satisfaction out of the fact that as time goes on the colonel also sees the absolute absurdity of the proposition. In his life of Gouverneur

Morris he says:

On the judiciary his views were also sound. He upheld the power of the judges, and maintained that they should have absolute decision as to the constitutionality of any law. By this means he hoped to provide against the energachment of the popular branch of the Government, the one from which danger was to be feared, as a virtuous citizen will often act as a egislator in a way of which he would, as a private individual, afterwards be ashamed.

In the Review of Reviews for September, 1896, Col. Roosevelt

Furthermore, the Chicago convention attacked the Supreme Court. Again this represents a species of atavism; that is, of recurrence to the ways of remote barbarian ancestors. Savages do not like an independent and upright judiciary. They want the judge to decide their way; and if he does not, they want to behead him. The populists experience much the same emotions when they realize that the judiciary stands between them and plunder.

These are the views on the judiciary of Col. Roosevelt when he was not a candidate for a third-term nomination for the

Col. Roosevelt has been holding himself up to the people as the paragon of political virtue. He has assailed every man who ventured to disagree with him on any question. He brands every man as infamous whom he can not lash into agreeing with [Applause.]

I have been told that I was taking my political life in my own hands this morning in assuming to answer the vicious attacks of the colonel on me in my own State. If I did not do so this morning I would despise myself. [Applause.] My political friends and foes alike would despise me. [Applause.] My regard for the intelligence of the people of Kansas is above any fear of Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.]

I have been told before that I was taking my political life in my hands on this floor. I was told so when I attacked the Standard Oil Co. I was told so when I attacked the bucket shops and secured the passage of a law through this House making them outlaws. I was told so when I attacked the express companies, and I was told so when I attacked unscrupulous manufacturers, and I have been told so this morning because I resent Col. Roosevelt's attack on me and the insult to the intelligence of the people of Kansas that he gave them on last Friday when he assumed they did not know the difference between a judicial decision and a political campaign. [Applause.]

Virtue in politics is always in demand by the American people. There never was a time in the history of the Republic when the people required so high a standard of public service as they require to-day, and there has never been a time when public servants, from the President down to the humblest officer, so readily responded to that sentiment as to-day. [Applause.] The people of this country have been demanding certain things of their public servants. They have been demanding protection against great aggregations of wealth that control not only business but politics. To that sentiment of the American people Congress has responded. The President of the United States has responded and has brought more indictments and prosecution in three and a half years than all his predecessors in the Presidency.

Let me ask this of Col. Roosevelt to-day: Did you or did you not send a note to the Department of Justice asking that fur-ther steps toward the prosecution of the Harvester Trust be suspended? [Applause.] Did you or did you not flay malefactors of great wealth in whirlwind campaigns throughout the country and then in the nighttime, in private conference with the heads of the Steel Trust and the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co., agree that they should be united into one trust or monopoly?

Getting back to the original cause for the colonel's attack upon me, there must be a finality of judicial decision. body must have the final word. Col. Roosevelt said, in his Life of Gouverneur Morris, the court should have it. Thomas Jefferson said the court should have it; the Constitution of the United States says the court shall have it; the constitution of every State in the Union says the courts shall have the final word. The colonel now says that in constitutional questions in the States an appeal should be to the crowd out in the courthouse yard after the case has been tried by the court. [Applause.] Ye gods! What a proposition from a man who has been President of this Republic two terms and desires again to occupy that exalted position. Well, let us see. He is also in favor of the initiative and referendum.

Does anyone doubt that between 1890 and 1896 a law could have been enacted by the initiative and referendum making 4121 grains of silver (16 to 1), then worth 50 cents, equal to a dollar in gold, and that if the court had held such a law unconstitutional an appeal from that decision to a popular vote would have resulted in a decision being reversed and declaring the law constitutional by a majority vote?

Anyone familiar with history can easily understand that the time may soon come when the price of wheat-wheat being a prime necessity of life-might be fixed at 50 cents per bushel through the enactment of a law by the initiative and referendum. On appeal by the wheat growers to the court the law, of course, would be held unconstitutional. Then on appeal, provided for under the new government-the new charter of democracy-from that decision of the court back to a popular vote the law would be declared constitutional. growers, being in the minority, would, under this new government-this charter of democracy-formed by the proposed revolution, lose their right to property and the pursuit of their happiness.

In the government under our Constitution by law not by men the poorest individual and the minority have rights they can have protected in the courts to the extent of setting aside laws passed by Congress or by State legislatures, where a final decree protects the individual in the value of his dollar, in his bushel of wheat, in his loaf of bread, in his home, no matter how humble.

All the decisions of all the country are not without error. Nothing that is human is perfect; we are continually reforming and growing better, but the proposed appeal from the decision of the court to a popular vote is not reform. It is revolution that will be the beginning of the early end of the last days of the best government the world has ever known, and the end of a government "of the people, for the people, and by the people," in which neither the liberty nor the property of the smallest minority nor of any man can be taken from him by the mafority. The personal security our Government gives every man in it has fostered a spirit of devotion to the Government and The personal security our Government gives every man has led to the greatest sacrifices for it.

The recall of judges became odious in the reign of the Stuart Kings and led the progressive Commons of England to assert their rights to have a judiciary that could without fear decide the law as it is, giving to high and low, rich and poor, equal and exact justice as God gave them the light to see justice.

One of the strongest counts in the indictment that Thomas Jefferson made against George III in the Declaration of Independence was that-

He has obstructed the administration of justice by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers; he has made judges dependent on his will alone for their tenure in office.

It has been forcibly and solemnly declared by Col. Roosevelt that ours is the only Government in which the courts are given the right to set aside a law as unconstitutional.

Even if the claim made were true, it is not important. Our people have made precedents for the government of a free people; but the claim made does not state the facts. I am indebted to Mr. Justice Burch of the Supreme Court of Kansas for information on this subject.

Let it be understood, in the first place, that our National Constitution is a law and that each State constitution is a law, the Federal Constitution being by express declaration the supreme law of the land. Acts of Congress and acts of the State legislatures are laws. Whenever the validity of a law enacted by statute is challenged in a court the court compares it with the Constitution to see if the two laws are con-If they are inconsistent, the case can not be decided sistent. according to both. One of them must give way, and the Constitution being the supreme law, the law enacted by the statute

Col. Roosevelt has said the courts of Australia have no such power as the courts of the United States in this regard. The colonel has overlooked the fact that in the year 1900 the people of Australia asked the British Parliament to give them the protection of just such a judicial power. A constitution which they had adopted, providing for a supreme court modeled after the Supreme Court of the United States, was embodied in the act of the British Parliament, which by her Britannic Majesty's proclamation established the Commonwealth of Australia, to begin January 1, 1901. Each State of the Commonwealth possesses a constitution and courts of its own, as in the United States, and the power of the courts, State and Federal, over unconstitutional legislation is described in "Quick and Garran's Annotated Constitution," Sir John Quick, one of the authors, having been a member of the Australian constitutional convention.

The work contains the following on page 791:

In the exercise of the duty of interpretation and ajudication not only the high court but every court of competent jurisdiction has the right to declare that a law of the Commonwealth or of a State is void by reason of transgressing the Constitution. This is a duty cast upon the courts by the very nature of the judicial functions. The Federal Parliament and the State parliaments are not sovereign bodies; they are legislatures with limited powers, and any law which they attempt to pass in excess of those powers is no law at all. It is simply a nullity, entitled to no obedience. The question whether those powers halle in any instance been exceeded is, when it arises in a case between parties, a merely judicial question on which the courts must pronounce.

It was a high compliment to the fathers of the Republic that Great Britain, in 1900, put into effect for the government of the people of a continent a written constitution modeled upon the Constitution of the United States of America.

Since then many constitutional questions have been decided. Numerous laws affecting human rights from a vital standpointlaws affecting the terms and conditions of life and employment among wage earners-have been passed upon and held to be unconstitutional.

In a union-label case, in Australia, it was held that a federal act establishing a worker's mark intended to promote the interests of union labor invaded the power of the separate States over domestic commerce and industry. In a State railway servants case it was held that the inclusion of a federal act of disputes relating to employment on State railways made the act, as their expression is, ultra vires. The excise tariff act of 1906 undertook, by means of excise duties on manufactured goods, to apply the principle of what is known in Australia as the "new protection," which aims to secure to workmen a reasonable share of any profit accruing to employers from protection taxes. The act was held to be void. A list prepared in July of last year includes seven decisions of this kind.

In directing the attention of the United States to the Government of Australia, Col. Roosevelt failed to refer to one very pertinent matter. His remedy of an appeal to the people from the decisions of the courts on constitutional questions was presented to the Australian constitutional convention, was fully debated, received no substantial support, and was finally withdrawn.

In the debate in the Australian constitutional convention the following remarks were made:

It is quite impossible that the people can sit as judges, because the function of judges is one thing and the functions of electors of the Commonwealth is quite another thing. I am not confounding these two. The people are absolutely incompetent to judge whether a certain law is or is not ultra vires, and I would not dream of committing that charge to the people, for there are no persons less fit than the general electors, taken all together on a referendum, of any country to decide whether this or that is a law.

To make an appeal to the people upon whether the court was right or wrong would weaken the authority of the court, which, if it be an arbiter, must be the final arbiter.

This is not unlike what Col. Roosevelt said in his life of Morris, from which I read a moment ago. This is what he said:

He (Morris) denounces with the fierce scorn that they richly merit the despicable demagogues and witless fools who teach that in all cases the views of the majority must be implicitly obeyed, and that public men have only to carry out its will and thus acknowledge themselves the willing instruments of folly and vice.

Great Britain has no supreme law which takes the form of a written constitution. Parliament is supreme. There is no document in which the people have said to the Parliament that no law establishing a religion or law taking private property without compensation shall be passed. Consequently acts of Par-Hament, as they are passed, are the supreme law in the fabric of the only constitution they have.

If an act be insisted upon as the one which governs a controversy, and a later act be discovered relating to the same subject, the court interprets the provisions of each, following the same methods and using the same rules adopted by the American courts, to ascertain the true scope and purpose of each. Having discovered the meaning of each act the court compares them, and if they conflict, decides the case according to the one which is superior in authority.

In England the choice is between different acts of Parliament. In this country it is between the Constitution and a statute. In England this function has been performed in reference to acts concerning the jurisdiction of courts and consequently properly falls within the domain of English constitutional law, and this has been the English practice times out of mind. The rule in Canada is similar to that in the mother country.

In Germany the power of the judiciary respecting statutes which are unconstitutional has been considered in three classes of cases. First, where a state statute conflicts with a state constitution; second, where a state statute conflicts with an imperial statute or the imperial constitution; and third, where an imperial law conflicts with the imperial constitution. first and third classes cases indicate that if a conflict exist between a statute which the courts are called upon to apply and a higher law the latter must govern. The judges have not consistently acted upon the principle.

In the second class, however, in which a statute conflicts with an imperial statute or with the imperial constitution, the courts and the authorities are unanimous in holding that the judges must give preference to the higher law. The leading case is one in which an income-tax law of Prussia was held void because contrary to the clause of the imperial constitution which prohibits double taxation.

The judicial powers exercised in other countries of standing with our country confirms instead of condemns the judicial power exercised under our Constitution.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a ques-

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. At the time that President Roosevelt agreed that the Steel Trust might acquire the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co.

Mr. CAMPBELL. No; I must decline to yield upon that. Mr. SIMS. But I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SIMS. Just a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, go ahead and ask the question.

Mr. SIMS. Did Roosevelt or did he not consult with and obtain the approval of his Cabinet at that time, and who was then in the Cabinet?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not know whether he consulted his Cabinet or not. He rarely consulted anybody. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, why all this fury?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a statement right there?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, my time is passing very rapidly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I only wish to suggest that he decided in 20 minutes the whole question of law which had taken the Supreme Court of the United States 20 years to decide.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why all this fury? Why is this candidate for the Presidency for a third-term nomination fanning the passions of the people into a fury throughout the length and breadth of the land? What is wrong? What has happened in the last four years? One important thing. The colonel is not President of the United States. [Applause.]

Four years ago I was for Senator Dolliver for the Republican nomination for President. Col. Roosevelt convinced me, as he convinced a majority of the Republicans throughout the country, that William H. Taft, with whom he was well acquainted, who was his Secretary of War, who had done the big jobs for him during his entire occupancy of the Presidency, was the best fitted man in the Republic for the place. [Applause.] He said of William H. Taft that he was as great as Lincoln and that he would give the American people the kind of administration that the country needed.

Mr. Speaker, he told the truth about that. The President has made good [applause on the Republican side]; he has fulfilled every promise made for him by Col. Roosevelt. Wherein has he failed? He has led in the enactment and enforcement of laws. Wherein has he Has it offended the colonel that some of his particular friends have been haled into court by the order of the President? Did it offend the colonel that a suit was instituted against the Steel Corporation and the Harvester Trust? The McCormick interests and the Morgan interests are allied with the steel interests and to the Harvester Trust and are back of the campaign of Col. Roosevelt.

Why all this fury? Are the people in want? Are the economic and financial conditions of the country prostrated? Ah, no; they never were better than they are to-day. There never was a time when labor was more generally employed or at bet-There never ter wages than to-day. There never was a time when the financial conditions of the country were better than they are There never was a time, I repeat, when public servants responded more readily to demands from the people than they do to-day.

The Republican platform promises of 1908 have been faithfully kept by the party.

The party enacted a law giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix reasonable rates on interstate railroads; established the Court of Commerce; provided for postal savings banks; established the Bureau of Mines and Mining, providing rescue appliances for miners in case of mine disasters; admitted Arizona and New Mexico into the sisterhood of States, with State constitutions that conform to the political system of the Federal Constitution.

We have taken river and harbor improvements out of the pork-barrel class and put that work on a sound business basis. We have created a Tariff Board for the purpose of placing the tariff above partisan politics and of taking tariff making out of the uncertainty of bargain and trade, placing it upon a scientific and accurate basis, giving to the American laborer and American manufacturer the difference in the cost of producing like articles in this and in foreign countries. The wisdom of the establishment of that board has been emphatically attested by its efficiency, as shown in the report it has made upon the wool and woolen schedule. We have passed a corporation-tax law, under which we raise $30,000.000 of revenue annually. We have submitted a constitutional amendment to enable the enactment of an income-tax law. We have provided for a stocks and bonds commission that has made an illuminating report upon which legislation may be enacted to prevent the overcapitalization and the overissue of stocks and bonds by corporations engaged in the transportation and distribution of interstate and foreign commerce. We have passed a law authorizing and directing the conservation of our natural resources, and the settled policies of the country on conservation are carried on under that law without friction or comment. We passed a tariff law that is not perfect, but it can be said of it that its provisions have not closed the door of a single factory or thrown a laborer out of work anywhere in the United States.

Under that law, imperfect as it is, we have paid all the expenses of the Government from the revenues derived under it, and have converted a deficit of $58,000,000 the year before it was enacted into a surplus of $30,000,000 the year after it was passed. Under that law, from sea to sea, our labor is generally well employed at fair wages—the highest ever paid to wage earners in any country at any time. Our foreign trade is greater than ever before. We exported during the month of January this year $202,500,000 worth of American goods to foreign countries. In the same month we imported $143,500,000 worth of foreign goods into our own country. Our inward and outward commerce for the first seven months of this fiscal year amounted to the colossal sum of $2,220,000,000, the greatest foreign commerce in a like period that has ever been enjoyed by any nation in the history of mankind. At the rate of these seven months, our foreign trade for the year ending July 1, 1912, will make our exports $2,240,000,000 and our imports $1,563,000,000, making an annual foreign trade of $3,805,000,000, leaving a balance of trade in our favor of $675,000,000.

What is the trouble, Mr. Speaker? It is ambition, thirst for power, by the greatest politician since Julius Cæsar. Col. Roosevelt has all of the ambition of Cæsar, of Cromwell, and of Napoleon combined without the statesmanship ability of either. [Applause and laughter.] I repeat, he is as ambitious for power as Casar or Napoleon, and he is adopting their plan for securing imperial power. [Applause.]

Lincoln, whom he so often quotes, told the people of this Republic in one of the greatest speeches ever delivered within its confines that their principal danger would come from just such an attack as is being made to-day by Col. Roosevelt—to discredit public office, to discredit the laws, then to discredit the Constitution, then the necessity for a strong man to rule the people, and that is exactly what Mr. Roosevelt is planning to-day. Here is what Lincoln said:

At such a time and under such circumstances men of sufficient talent and ambitions will not be wanting to selze the opportunity, strike the blow, and overturn that fair fabric which for the last half century has been the fondest hope of the lovers of freedom throughout the world.

Many great and good men sufficiently qualified for any task they should undertake may be found whose ambition would aspire to nothing beyond a seat in Congress, a gubernatorial or a presidential chair, but such belong not to the family of the lion or the tribe of the eagle. What! think you these places would satisfy an Alexander, a Cwsar, or a Napoleon? Never. Towering genius disdains a beaten path. It seeks regions hitherto unexplored. It sees no distinction in adding story to story upon the monuments of fame erected to the memory of others. It denies that it is glory enough to serve under any chief. It scorns to tread in the footsteps of any predecessor, however illustrious. It thirsts and burns for distinction and, if possible, it will have it. * * Is it unreasonable, then, to expect that some man possessed of the loftlest genius, coupled with ambition sufficient to push it to its utmost stretch, will at some time spring up among us? And when such a one does it will require the people to be united with each other, attached to the Government and laws and generally intelligent, to successfully frustrate his designs.

Expressing a like sentiment, Hamilton said, in his first paper in the Federalist, urging the adoption of the Constitution-

That the vigor of government is essential to the security of liberty;

* * * their interest can never be separated; and that a dangerous ambition more often lurks behind a specious mask of zeal for the rights of the people than under the forbidding appearance of zeal for the firmness and efficiency of government. History will teach us that the former has been found a much more certain road to the introduction of despotism than the latter, and that of those men who have overturned the libertles of republies, the greatest number have begun their career by paying obsequious court to the people—commencing demagogues and ending tyrants.

If we are wise-and we are-we will to-day heed the warning of patriots and statesmen, and not experiment with the fundamental principles of a government that for a century and a quarter has guaranteed life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness to the most aggressive and progressive people history has known, and been the model for better government and higher and nobler civilization throughout the world.

Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet, Lest we forget; lest we forget.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill concerning publicity of newspaper owners and editors, as authorized by a special rule, with an amendment thereto which I shall offer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to have printed in the Congressional Record an amendment touching the ownership of newspapers and an amendment which he proposes to offer to the amendment. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and there objection? it is so ordered.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there are five Mondays in this month, and the Committee on the District of Columbia would be no loser by it, and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have their appropriation bill under consideration, I ask unanimous consent that next Monday be substituted for to-day for the purpose of transacting District business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that, inasmuch as this mouth has five Mondays, the fifth Monday be substituted for the fourth for the transaction of District business. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the request, and did not catch the statement of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The request is that next Monday being the fifth Monday it be substituted for to-day—the fourth Mondayfor the transaction of District business.

Mr. MANN. That is under the same terms?

The SPEAKER. Under the same terms. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, May 26, 1912, at 12 o'clock m. be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of the Hon. James P. Latta, late a Representative from the State of Nebraska.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question was taken, and the order was agreed to.

SPEECH OF SENATOR O'GORMAN.

Mr. CONRY. Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise? Mr. CONRY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a speech delivered by Senator O'Gorman, of New York, at a banquet held by the National Democratic Club of New York City on Jefferson's birthday last.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to print in the Congressional Record a speech delivered by Senator O'Gorman at a banquet given by the National Democratic Club of New York City on the 13th of this month. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears note and it is congressed. none, and it is so ordered.

. The speech is as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR JAMES A. O'GORMAN AT THE JEFFERSON DAY BAN-QUET OF THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC CLUB, HELD AT THE WALDORF-ASTORIA, NEW YORK CITY, APRIL 13, 1912.

"On this day a grateful Nation pays tribute to the memory of one of the fathers of the Republic. To Democrats the day has a peculiar significance, for our party creed found its birth in the genius of the illustrious American whose natal day we commemorate.

"Thomas Jefferson was born 160 years ago. He died on July 4, 1826, in his eighty-third year and on the fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence. His public career embraced more than half a century. By birth an aristocrat, he abhorred class distinctions, and devoted his life to the betterment of humanity. He was a member of the Virginia House of Delegates, a member of the Continental Congress, Governor of Virginia, a Member of the Congress of the United States, minister to France, Secretary of State in Washington's first Cabinet, Vice President under John Adams, and President of the United States for two terms.

Three great events in our national life were the Declaration of Independence, the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and the Louisiana Purchase. Two of these achievements are im-perishably associated with the name and fame of Thomas Jefferson. When 33 years of age he wrote the Declaration of Independence, which marks one of the most important epochs in the history of government. It dismembered an empire and founded a nation upon the immutable principles of human freedom and equality; and at a critical stage in our struggle against British oppression it gave us character abroad, and inspired enthusiasm and resolution and confidence at home.

"The next enduring contribution of Jefferson to the cause of human freedom was the purchase from France, during his administration as President, of the Louisiana Territory, which extended from the Gulf of Mexico north to the Canadian line, and from the Mississippi west to the Spanish possessions on the Pacific coast. That empire, acquired for $15,000,000, was larger than the original 13 States. It now contains 16 States. It has a population of 20,000,000, and its value as an integral part of the Union is without price. Events are great in their We call them great because of the results that Measured by this test, the Declaration of Inconsequences. follow them. dependence and the Louisiana purchase give their author high rank among the benefactors of the human race. Jefferson was absent in France during the sessions of the convention that framed the Federal Constitution, but the adoption of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution was due largely to his insistence that they were essential to the scheme of government devised by the patriots who had achieved our independence.

After Washington, Jefferson was the foremost figure in the formative period of the Republic. He could not make a speech, but in the science of government he was not surpassed by any of his compatriots. The purity of his patriotism was never challenged. He was an ardent advocate of the rights of man, and was unrelenting in his opposition to the monarchial tendencies of Hamilton, who wanted the President and Senate to be elected for life, and proposed that the governors of the States be selected by Congress. Hamilton and Adams distrusted the people, as do many of their followers in our own day. In the administration of John Adams the naturalization period was extended to 14 years, but was reduced to 5 years when Jefferson became President, and in this connection it is worthy of note that the Society of Tammany, or Columbian Order, was the first influential body to utter a protest against the odious alien and sedition laws; and it is, as it should be, a source of pride to that venerable society that it took a leading part in the agitation which led to the repeal of those un-American measures.

"Jefferson had confidence in the people, and he relied on the masses as the safest depository of political power. He believed in the equality of rights and responsibilities. He believed in the freedom of individual enterprise untrammeled by special privilege and unshackled by governmental restraints and favoritism. He had faith in humanity and hastened the dawn of a new era of hope for the oppressed of all lands. In his first inaugural he enunciated the creed of the Democratic Party. He declared his belief in the principles of 'Equal and exact justice to all men of whatever state or persuasion, religion or politics; peace and commerce and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none; economy in the public expense that labor might be lightly burdened.' Jefferson practiced what he preached. In his day and for 50 years afterwards the annual cost of the National Government averaged $1 for each member of the population. In this era of Republican waste and extravagance the cost per capita is thirteen times greater. More than a billion dollars is now being spent annually by the Republican administration, and a distinguished member of that party has recently confessed that three hundred millions of public money could be saved annually if rigid economy were exer-cised, but retrenchment in public expenditures can not be hoped for while the Republican Party is in control of the National Government.

"Jefferson believed that the Presidency should be limited to two terms. He followed the precedent established by Washington and refused to accept a third term, although the legislatures of five States urged him to accept a renomination, which would be equivalent to an election. No attempt to violate one of the wisest traditions of the Republic was made until the case of Gen. Grant, who, after an intervening term, was suggested for reelection in 1880. The disaster which that project invited should be heeded by a distinguished citizen of this State, who is deceiving himself with the hope that the American people will confer upon him a power which Washington and Jefferson would not accept and which was denied to the greatest of American soldiers.

"As Democrats we may boast of an honorable ancestry. As Democrats we may boast of an honorable ancestry. We have survived the vicissitudes incident to the political conflicts of more than a century. We have witnessed the dissolution of one opposing party after another. The principles that we espouse are as vital to-day as when they were enunciated by Jefferson and practiced by Monroe and Jackson and Cleveland. The past is secure. What of the future? To-day the followers of Jefferson are the only united, harmonious, and coherent party in the Nation. We are on the eve of a presidential election. Our party is rich in presidential material, and we may have preferences for that high office, but we have no divisions, and whoever is selected as the standard bearer at Baltimore can be assured of the support of a united, vigorous, and aggressive party. The Republican Party is rent in twain. It is discredited, disorganized, and demoralized. The titular head of that once grand old party describes those who support his rivals as emotionalists and neurotics. The retort courteous describes the other factions as political paranoiacs. If either accusation be true, the Republican Party can have no claim upon the favor of the American electorate. There is an old adage that when a certain class of people fall out honest men come into their own. For many years the Democratic Party has endeavored to free the American people from the unjust exactions of the tariff, the trusts, and every form of oppression by special privilege. The Republican Party has claimed that a high tariff was necessary to protect wage earners from the products of the labor of Europe, although free trade in labor itself has never been seriously interfered with. It is now generally recognized that labor has not shared in the fruits of protection, for American workmen have been forced to compete not only among themselves, but also with the cheap labor imported by the protected industries. This is well illustrated in Lawrence, where most of the labor is of recent importation, and where the meager wages paid in the mills have driven from employment in the protected industries in that city nearly all

"In a public speech a few weeks since, in the city of Chicago, the Secretary of War declared that during the last 30 years there has been a steady increase of unnecessary protection every time the Republican Party has touched the tariff; that privi-leged interest have fattened upon the tariff as a bounty; and that the beneficiaries of the tariff have become stronger and stronger within the party and the Nation. How can Mr. Taft reconcile this declaration that his party has served the special interests for 30 years with his defense of the Payne-Aldrich tariff, which was dictated by the special interests and which increased the tariff on more than 600 articles? How can be justify his veto of the tariff legislation of last year, framed by a Democratic House in response to the protest of the masses of the people, who suffered from the high cost of living caused in great part by the high tariff enacted by the Republican Party? I doubt whether the history of American politics furnishes a parallel to the kaleidoscopic record of Mr. Taft on the tariff. When a candidate in 1908 he promised a reduction of the tariff. After election the Republican Party repudiated its pledges and increased the tariff. Mr. Taft condemned the bill and denounced the wool schedule as indefensible, and it was hoped he would veto the measure. He disappointed these expectations. He signed it, and, notwithstanding his previous utterances, de-clared it was the best tariff bill ever enacted. He later apologized for this unmerited approval, and in 1910 urged the elimination of its bad features. A bill accomplishing this reform was passed by a Democratic House last year, but he vetoed it with an inconsistency that has ceased to surprise the American people. He now professes a desire to eradicate the iniquitous features of the tariff, but refuses to do anything until a Tariff Board, working on an impossible principle, reports the results of its investigations. But the period of obstruction is nearing its end. The people will not tolerate the use of a Tariff Board as a device to delay the reduction of the tariff which the Republican Party promised four years ago.

"The people are beginning to realize as they never did before that when the law compels a citizen to contribute his just share to the support of the Government, that is taxation; but when it compels him to pay tribute to enrich private enterprises and confederated monopolies, that is robbery. Mr. Taft's Cabinet officer is authority for the statement that for 30 years our countrymen have been robbed by Republican legislation, and it can not now be denied that the tariff policy of the Republican Party has destroyed competition, created monopolies, and paralyzed and strangled our foreign trade. The only hope for relief from these conditions lies with the Democratic Party. The leaders of the Republican Party are now fencing over questions which are important, but which are not vital. They might well wish to divert attention from the record of the Republican Party on the tariff and trust questions, but with the vacillation and inefficiency which have marked this administration and its betrayal of the pledges upon which it secured the election in 1908, we have an issue upon which a Democrat can be elected President in November next. The tariff and the trusts are the only issues upon which we have elected a President since 1856, and they make the issue upon which the party will go forth to a glorious triumph in the contest now impending. Animated by the spirit of Jefferson and cherishing the memory of his achievements, we may invite the cooperation of all citizens who desire the restoration of a people's government, free from the sinister influences which in recent years have dominated the Republican Party and menaced the integrity of our institutions. The prospects of party success were never brighter; and with unity and harmony in our ranks and with a firm adherence to the principles of Jefferson, we may look forward with confidence to the result of the campaign upon which we are about to enter."

ICE FLOES IN NORTH ATLANTIC.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the same privilege accorded to the gentleman from New York a moment ago. I want to extend in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement authorized by the Secretary of the Navy, as coming from the Hydrographic Office, and having reference to ice floes in the North Atlantic. It also throws light upon the accident to the steamer Titanic.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to extend his remarks in the Record? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement referred to follows.

SHIPPING WARNED OF ICE CONDITIONS IN NORTH ATLANTIC.

IBy the Hydrographic Office.1

[By the Hydrographic Office.]

For more than a quarter of a century the Hydrographic Office of the Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, has been publishing graphically from month to month a series of charts known as the Pilot Chart of the North Atlantic Ocean, depicting thereon the physical conditions of the ocean and of the atmosphere for the current month, as well as the location of dangers to navigation as reported by incoming ships. A summary of these dangers and a more detailed description than the space on the Pilot Chart would permit was in time given from week to week on a printed sheet known as the Hydrographic Bulletin. These publications were circulated freely among the shipmasters and shipping people in return for their news of the sca, the point of contact between the office at Washington and the marine world being a chain of branch hydrographic offices at the principal seaports. Practically all the captains in the trans-Atlantic trade cooperate in this work by handing in their information upon arrival in port to the branch hydrographic offices. In recent years the collection of marine data has been immensely accelerated by the use of radio telegraphy, and the Hydrographic Office is thereby enabled to publish daily in a so-called Daily Memorandum whatever important reports of dangers have been received. This sheet is prepared every afternoon and is malled to the branch hydrographic offices and there given publicity to all concerned. By this means Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, etc., are daily put in possession of the accumulated reports of dangerous derelicts and icebergs, which have been edited by experts in this line of work. Thus in the case of the recent loss of the Titanio the shipping companies and shipmasters had been put in possession of the experience and judgment of a trained staff in the Hydrographic Office as summarized in a pamphlet printed in April, 1909, entitled "North Atlantic Ice Movements," giving a study of the entire question, with diagrams to show the us at a given date he reckons its future position for an interval of a revidays.

The April Pilot Chart, which was issued March 28, 1912, showed that in March ice had come as far south as latitude 44° N. The Dally Memorandum, prior to the 13th instant, showed that the trend of ice was to the southward, leebergs being sighted below the forty-third parallel on April 7, 8, 9, and 11; on the 9th and 11th it had reached the forty-second parallel, and on the 11th some of it was seen south of latitude 42°. The Dally Memorandum of April 15 contains a message from the steamship Amerika via steamship Titanic and Cape Race, Newfoundland, April 14, 1912, to the Hydrographic Office, Washington, D. C.: "Amerika has passed two large icebergs in 41° 27' N, 50° 8' W, on the 14th of April."—Knuth.

As the Titanic's position is reported to have been latitude 41° 16', longitude 50° 14' at the time of her disaster, it is thus seen that the message which she transmitted for the Amerika doubtless relates to the very ice upon which she was wrecked.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21279, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21279.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union for the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, with Mr. Hay in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

For two delegates to the International Postal Union at Madrid, 1913, to be appointed by the President, $5,000 each, $10,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to get some information in reference to this. How long do these delegates serve?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I understand they serve for the next convention, which will be about two years from now. Really, they do not perform services except at the international conventions and preparing for them.

Mr. MANN. Why should their expenses amount to $5,000 each for attending an international convention?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not know why they should, except that the department estimates that is a proper sum to cover the expenses-the travel there and back, their expenses at the place, and a reasonable compensation.

Mr. MANN. Certainly the travel there and back and expenses there will not amount to $5,000 a person for attending an international convention which probably only lasts for a few days or, at best, a few weeks.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that has been the usual amount carried in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I know there was inserted into the bill a few years ago in some way a provision for the expenses of delegates to this International Postal Union for the purpose—I will not say for the purpose-but said by some gentleman to be for the purpose of providing places for some gentlemen who were in or out of Congress, or who were in and were going out. It may have been an entirely proper thing. I do not know. But if these gentlemen perform service by the year, if they are really engaged in working for the Government in preparation for the postal union meetings, that is one thing. I am not advised that they are. But if this is an honorarium, I think it is fair for the House to know who are the beneficiaries of this hono-

Mr. MOON of Tennessee, Mr. Chairman— The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon]?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am sure I am not able to tell the gentleman who will be appointed, whether they will be gentlemen who have not positions and who are desiring positions which the department desires to give them, or not. Matters of that kind in the administration of the Post Office Department, of course, are not disclosed to the committee. This sum of $5,000 for each delegate has been for some time carried in the bill. I assume, of course, that the delegates to this convention must take some time to prepare themselves for the discharge of their Whether the amount is too great or not I am not prepared to say now. Out of deference to the judgment of the Postmaster General and the department, the committee reluctantly placed this sum in the bill. There were some of us who were opposed to it entirely. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] is himself in a position to show that this service is useless, I am entirely willing to accede to a motion to strike it from the bill.

Mr. MANN. I am not in a position to show that the service is useless. I do not know about that. I take it that if we are parties to an International Postal Union it is proper that we should have delegates there. But certainly we ought to have men experienced enough in postal affairs here to go as delegates to that meeting and receive only their expenses going and coming and while there.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I take it that no gentleman who is competent to represent the Government of the United States in a convention of this sort could afford very well to go for mere expenses, nor could he afford not to be thoroughly prepared to meet other delegates in the consideration of international postal The man who is worth anything at all would seem questions. to me to be worth the sum fixed in this bill. Yet, as I said before, if the gentleman will show it ought to be less, we will accept his judgment. We have only taken the judgment of the department, and that we are obliged to do in many of these matters, and it is impossible for us to go into details of the service performed there, because that can not be understood in advance. We must of necessity take the judgment of the department in this matter.

Mr. MANN. How often does this postal union meet?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Every two years, in my judgment. However, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Tilson] corrects me, and says the last one was six years ago. But they are subject to call of the postal convention. I think the convention meets next year.

Mr. MANN. I should suppose in sending a man to this convention some one would be selected naturally from the department who is informed in reference to post-office matters. Of course, if we practically direct the President to pay a compensation of $5,000 to each delegate, he naturally will do that at the direction of Congress. I shall withdraw the point of order and offer a motion to reduce the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I offer an amendment to page 24, line 1, to strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "two."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 24, line 1, by striking out the word "ten" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "two."

Mr. MANN. And also strike out the words "$5,000 each." It is part of the same amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the remainder of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Also strike out the words "$5,000 each" in the same line.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offered would make the paragraph provide the sum of $2,000 to pay the expenses of two delegates to the International Postal Union next year. It seems to me that is an ample sum, quite commensurate with the sums usually provided for such purposes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the chairman of the committee what are the duties of these delegates and what is the length of time necessary to spend at these conven-

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The duties of delegates to the postal convention are those connected with fixing the rates of mails in an international way.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What is the usual time spent in that con-

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not know what time is taken in the preparation or what time they stay. The item is similar to that which has been carried in the bill for some years at

I want to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the figure presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] is rather a small one to secure a good competent man to represent the United States in that convention. I think it would be hardly possible to get such a man for a thousand dollars. I myself have thought that the amount, $10,000, for the two was rather large, yet the department insisted very strongly upon that amount. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois by inserting the word "six" instead of the word "two."

Mr. MANN. Oh, not "six." Let us see if we can not reach I would be willing, so far as I am concerned, to a compromise. make the total amount $4,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I move to strike out "two" and insert "six."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "two" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "six."

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, $3,000 to each delegate going abroad to a convention is too much. We are not supposed to pay salaries to these delegates. We are supposed to pay their expenses. We have a number of international conventions, most of which are provided for in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and that is where this ought to be provided for, not in the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You can not get a man to go without a salary of something.

Mr. MANN. Why, if the Post Office Department has not men sufficiently competent to represent the Government at an international convention like this, they ought to dismiss the whole service and enlist new men.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman's idea is to take somebody from the department. It might not be wise to take them from there at all.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not see the wisdom of taking out-siders. Who is so well posted in postal affairs and so well qualified to judge of what should be done at the International Postal Union Convention as the officials who deal with those problems in this country? I do not think there is any occasion for paying salaries. I happen to know how the item first got in the bill a few years ago. I am not going to say. But it was for the purpose of taking care of a distinguished gentleman who had rendered faithful service to his country. There is no reason for paying these salaries. We do not do it in any of the other international conventions and we ought not do it here.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has given me some information that I did not have before. I did not know that his party had made provision in the line that he indicates, otherwise we would not have taken the recommendation of the Postmaster General on this question. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment to the amendment on the gentleman's statement of the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read,

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of agency for inspection of manufacture of official envelopes at Cincinnati, Ohio, $5,700.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the item which has just been read ought really to be under the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General's office.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer an amendment to strike out the paragraph and then insert it in the proper place later on.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will ask unanimous consent at the end of the bill to transfer two or three items, of which this

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to pass the paragraph. Mr. MANN. No:

Mr. MANN. No; that is not the gentleman's request. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman can move to strike out the paragraph now.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I know that can be done, but I will simply ask unanimous consent later to transfer it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of limited indemnity for the loss of pieces of first-class domestic registered matter, $25,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 25, the words "first class," and to insert, after the word "dollars," in line 26, the words "of the first, third, and fourth classes," so that the indemnity will cover all three of those classes. That is the intention of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 25, strike out the words "first class," and after the word "dollars," in line 26, insert the words "of the first, third, and fourth classes."

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of limited indemnity for the loss of registered articles in the international mails, $7,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last ord. This item in the current law was $15,000, of which $8,000 was immediately available, as there was some deficiency. In view of the loss of the registered mail on the Titanic, I ask the gentleman whether it may not be advisable to increase the amount, and to make part of it immediately available?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am rather inclined to think it would be. In line 2, page 25, I move to strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "fifteen," and after the word "dollars," in line 3, I move to insert the words "of which $8,000 shall be immediately available."

Mr. MURDOCK. Will that cover losses during the current

Mr. MANN. That is precisely what we did last year, and in view of the accident to the Titanic I have suggested to the gentleman from Tennessee that he offer this amendment, and he has done so.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For travel and miscellaneous expenses in the postal service, office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General, $1,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, L offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Insert as a separate paragraph:
"That hereafter magazines, periodicals, and other regularly issued publications, in raised characters for the use of the blind, whether prepared by hand or printed, which contain no advertisements and for which no subscription fee is charged, shall be transmitted in the United States mails free of postage and under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, this amendment relates to the carriage free of certain magazines printed in raised letters for the blind. There are two kinds of raised letters in use for the blind. One is known as the Moon system, a letter which older people who are blind can read easily. A Mrs. Ziegler philanthropically began the publication some years ago of a magazine for free distribution among the blind, a magazine of this character. It is printed in both systems of raised letters. It carries no advertisements; it is kept up by her private ex-penditure. It is not extensive. A measure like this has passed this body in a previous year.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me the interruption, I could not catch the purport of the amendment by the reading of it from the desk. It is not limited to any par-ticular publication for the blind, but applies to all publications?

Mr. MURDOCK. It applies to all publications that carry no advertisements and for which no subscription price is asked. The amendment has this added degree of merit, that a great many of the older blind are poor, from the very nature of things. This will not burden the mail and will not result in profit to anybody. The revenue which the Government will lose, I think, amounts to something like $1,000, if I am correctly informed. The measure passed this House once before, and I think was favorably reported in the Senate, but through an early adjournment, or something of that kind, it failed to become a law.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is there now any provision in the law touching the postage to be paid on mail matter for the blind?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that there is, that any book in raised letters for the blind, loaned by any association or library, shall go through the mails free, but it has been held by the legal authorities that this magazine published by Mrs. Ziegler is not a loan, but is a gift, and it is excluded from the mails on that account.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was considered, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amend-

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, immediately after line 6, and as a new section, insert the following:

"That from and after the passage of this Act all periodical publications issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals, and as frequently as four times a year, by or under the auspices of a benevolent or fraternal society or order organized under the lodge system and having a bona fide membership of not less than one thousand persons, or by a regularly incorporated institution of learning, or by a regularly setablished State institution of learning supported in whole or in part by public taxation, or by or under the auspices of a trades-union, and all publications of strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, including the bulletins issued by State boards of health, shall be admitted to the mails as second-class matter, and the postage thereon shall be the same as on other second-class matter, and such periodical publications, issued by or under the auspices of benevolent or fraternal societies or orders or trades-unions, or by strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, shall have the right to carry advertising matter, whether such matter pertains to such benevolent or fraternal societies or orders, trades-unions, strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, or to other persons, institutions, or concerns; but such periodical publications, hereby permitted to carry advertising matter, must not be designed or published primarily for advertising purposes, and shall be originated and published to further the objects and purposes of such benevolent or fraternal societies or orders, trades-unions, or other societies, respectively; and all such periodicals shall be formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather or other substantial binding, such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications, issued by or under the auspices of benevolent or fraternal societies or orders or t

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, to that amendment I reserve a point of order.

Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, it will be necessary for me to say but little in explanation of this amendment.

During the past 33 years all newspapers and other periodicals have found their way into the mails as second-class matter through and under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1879. the act of July 16, 1894, or the act of June 6, 1900, and, as the latter act applies only to the publications of State departments of agriculture—which will in no wise be affected by the provisions of this amendment—it will not be necessary for us now to concern ourselves with it.

The act of 1879, in so far as it applies to second-class matter. reads as follows:

reads as follows:

Sec. 10. Mailable matter of the second class shall embrace all newspapers and other periodical publications which are issued at stated intervals, and as frequently as four times a year and are within the conditions named in sections twelve and fourteen.

Sec. 12. Matter of the second class may be examined at the office of mailing, and if found to contain matter which is subject to a higher rate of postage, such matter shall be charged with postage at the rate to which the inclosed matter is subject: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prohibit the insertion in periodicals of advertisements attached permanently to the same.

Sec. 14. The conditions upon which a publication shall be admitted to the second class are as follows:

First. It must regularly be issued at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively.

Second. It must be issued from a known office of publication.

Third. It must be formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

Fourth. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers; Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates.

For several years immediately following the passage of this act fraternal and kindred publications, having obtained the required number of subscribers, were admitted to the mails as second-class matter, without hindrance, upon the same terms and under the same conditions as were other periodicals. But as the years went by publishers of other periodicals entered complaints with the Post Office Department, insisting that the subscribers of fraternal periodicals were not being regularly obtained, because required to take the publications during their periods of membership; and that for this reason they should not be allowed the right accorded to their own publications, namely, the right of transmission through the mails as secondclass matter.

These complaints were so insistently made that the department was induced to give consideration to them, and agitation of the question brought on the enactment of the law of 1894, which reads as follows:

All periodical publications issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals and as frequently as four times a year, by or under the auspices of a benevolent or fraternal society or order organized under the lodge system and having a bona fide membership of not less than one thousand persons, or by a regularly incorporated institution of learning, or by or under the auspices of a trades union, and all publications of strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, including the bulletins issued by State boards of health, shall be admitted to the mails as second-class matter and the postage thereon shall be the same as on other second-class matter and no more: Provided, further, That such matter shall be originated and published to further the objects and purposes of such society, order, trades union, or institution of learning, and shall be formed of printed paper sheets without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

This act was very satisfactory to the publishers of these periodicals, they and the lawmakers particularly interested in such legislation then believing that the requirements as to their subscription lists were by it fixed, and that they were thereafter to have the same rights otherwise that they had previously enjoyed, namely, the right to print and publish such articles as they should believe would be of interest to their readers, and the right to carry such advertising matter as they might think would be interesting to their readers and beneficial to them-selves; and this being the case, many publishers caused their publications to be reentered under the later law. However, other publishers continued to circulate their publications under the old law, and, after a time, complaints again were made; but when the department thereafter gave them consideration it was agreed between these publishers and the department that if a sum certain should be set aside by the society or lodge—the same to be deducted from membership fees or dues paid in by members and held for this purpose; the by-laws making such provision—then this would be considered a compliance with the law and would be satisfactory. But the end was not yet; the department again raised the question as to the rights of these periodicals to be received into the mails as second-class matter, under the act of 1894, in case they carried advertising matter of any kind—except, perhaps, the advertising of themselves or of their own individual property or effects in case of their having any for sale—and the holding of the department then was, and ever since has been, that the kinds of publications embraced in this bill can have no right in the mails as second-class matter under the act of 1879 unless they shall have secured their subscribers in the usual way, and not in the manner hereinbefore referred to; and that they can not be received under the act of 1894, in case they contain any advertising, except as before stated. As the law now seems to be-under the holdings of the department-if the society has an old desk or an old chair of its own it can advertise the sale of same through its publication; but if it desires to advertise the productions or wares of others-no matter how beneficial the information may be to its members nor how profitable it may be to the society itself-nothing of the kind can be done, and it must leave this kind of privilege to other more favored periodicals, whose rights in this respect are seemingly unquestioned.

Much ado is made over the fact that fraternal periodicals secure their subscribers in the way named; but where is the wrong in the methods which they pursue? No one needs to join the society or union unless he chooses to do so; and if he does join he does it willingly and must be presumed to know, and usually does know, the nature of the contract or agreement into which he is entering-a portion of which is that he will take the society publication, while a member, and pay for it in the way the by-laws prescribe. If this were not done thus and so; if his subscription could not be obtained in this way, and for the time that he remains a member, the society paper could not be used as a conveyance of society notices, and would thus lose much of what it now is as a beneficial agent in its work.

But how do some of the favored periodicals secure their subscribers? Let me quote from the statement of Mr. Williams, of Detroit, Mich., in the Record of last Congress-March 8, 1910, page 2965-namely:

SUNDAY COUPON GIVES 10 VOTES—PURCHASE OF COUPONS IN BULK WILL NOT BE PERMITTED—A CHANCE FOR ALL.

Ten votes will be represented by the coupon to be printed in the Sunday Leader to-morrow for the free trip to the Jeffrles-Johnson fight offered by the Leader.

The coupon will be printed on page 2 to-morrow, and, as previously announced, all Sunday coupons will be good for 10 votes.

Save your coupons and have your friends saye for you, but pay particular attention to the fact that coupons purchased in bulk from news agents or news dealers will be thrown out. Under no circumstances will such coupons be counted.

Surely, if the law remains as it now is, under the construction of the department, "it strains at a gnat and swallows a camel."

What the publishers of these periodicals are contending for and what they want, and all they want, is the right to have their publications transmitted through the mails as second-class matter, with the same rights and privileges as are now enjoyed by other publications being so transmitted; and when we consider the great work these fraternities and unions are doing in the way of bringing help and comfort to the widow and to the fatherless-at the times, too, of their greatest need-instead of being discriminated against in any manner they should be helped to the uttermost in every way that justice and right will permit.

There is but little of selfishness in the work in which they are engaged; theirs, for the most part, is a work of humanity and of the heart. When fate strikes her hardest blow, when the natural stay and support of the family—the great institution upon which our civilization is based—is taken away, then does the fraternal organizations or trades-union step in and shoulder the burdens of the weak and of the helpless, and often does the work for them that otherwise would have to be done by charity or by the State.

Do we comprehend the extent of this great work? The proofs taken at the hearings on House bill 22239, in the last Congress, show that what are known as fraternal organizations alone have a membership of nearly 7,500,000, and that they have already paid out in benefits nearly $1,500,000,000.

Then, too, I can say that what is true of the fraternities is also true of the labor organizations. According to these same proofs the Cigar Makers' Union alone, with a membership of about 40,000, paid out for benefits in the year 1908 the sum of $586,255.73, and during the first 29 years and 2 months of its existence it paid out $8,372,383.60. There are 118 of these unions affiliated together in America—all doing presumably about the same work; and-assuming that each has paid out in this way substantially the same amount as the othersshould computation be made we would find that they have contributed almost another billion of dollars to those within their ranks and those depending on them; so that the great social work being done by these societies and unions is almost beyond our power to comprehend.

In granting the request which they are now making, we are giving to them nothing to which they are not richly entitled nothing which is not really theirs under the act of 1894, rightly construed. That they have been greatly annoyed and hindered in their work by the various holdings and changes in holdings—in the administration of the present laws—no one can gainsay; and that they should have their rights determined, and placed beyond chance for dispute, should be apparent to all.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is identical with the bill H. R. 22239, which bore my name in the last Congress. It passed the House at that time by unanimous consent and went to the Senate, but we were unable to get it out of the Senate committee. It gives only the same rights to these periodicals that are now enjoyed by newspapers and magazines—the fraternal publications and trade-union periodicals being allowed to get their subscribers in the way they usually do. It gives to them only the rights that are now enjoyed by general periodicals, in so far as carrying advertisements is concerned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DODDS. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I notice the gentleman's amendment does not include journals, magazines, or newspapers published by religious bodies. They have made an appeal to be included if any arrangement of this kind goes through. It seems to me the gentleman's amendment would be incomplete and special if it did not include these religious publications.

Mr. DODDS. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that when the bill went through the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, two years ago, the committee did not agree upon allowing the kind of periodicals that the gentleman refers to to be included. I have included in this amendment all of the publications that were allowed by the committee, two years ago, in my bill that passed the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will pardon me, these publications of large religious bodies are publications of a charitable and philanthropic nature and would in every way meet the conditions that the gentleman's amendment proposes in regard to the other societies and associations. It seems to me to be a serious objection to the amendment if it should be considered without considering these religious publications,

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DODDS. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have not seen the amendment which the gentleman offered this morning. Is it virtually the same amendment as the bill prepared two years ago?

Mr. DODDS. It is exactly the same, verbatim.
Mr. MURDOCK. As the bill was drawn at that time, did it admit the National Geographic Magazine, which carries no advertisements?

Mr. DODDS.

Mr. DODDS. I think it did.

Mr. MURDOCK. Was there any material change in that bill in the definition of what is a legitimate subscriber?

Mr. DODDS. Yes; it fixes the subscribers of periodicals as parties who are members of the order, society, or union, and exchanges, and bona fide subscribers, together with 10 per cent of such circulation in addition as sample copies.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DODDS. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the amendment now proposed include publications of religious organizations?

Mr. DODDS. It does not.

Mr. BORLAND. Is there any objection to such inclusion?
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I was just going to ask whether or not the gentleman would accept such an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest to the gentleman that the amendment as offered is confined to bodies which have a status that can be ascertained, but if you permit any religious publication to go through the mails, then a different question arises. Anybody can publish a religious publication. You can organize a publication and call it religious. There is no limitation whatever upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose the Roman Catholic Church, which issues an official publication not intended for profit wholly; or suppose the Presbyterian Church or the Methodist Book Concern issue publications; or suppose the Baptist Publication Society does, or the Protestant Episcopal Church does, or the Lutheran Church, and so on, how are you going to meet that question? These are associations that are constituted just as these bodies referred to in this amendment are, and it would seem that they are entitled to all the privileges that are extended to these fraternal organizations or unions, as proposed by this amendment. If the gentleman does not accept an amendment of that kind I shall offer it.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DODDS. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. I have introduced a bill, which is pending before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, providing for the extension of the second-class-privileges to these religious bodies, and it is designed to cover exactly the class of publication referred to, issued by the Methodist Church, the Presbyterian Church, the Protestant Episcopal Church, and other national religious bodies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman prepared to offer his amendment now as an amendment to this amendment?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman is, that

Mr. BORLAND. Some of these issue what they call a weekly bulletin, and upon that they have to pay first-class rates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I merely desire to ask if the gentleman will offer such an amendment as he suggests at this

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; if the gentleman from Michigan gets by the point of order, I shall be very glad to offer it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. DODDS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to pursue a little further the inquiry of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Murdock] as to whether the gentleman's bill embraces as a subscriber a member of a fraternal order who pays dues to a grand lodge and who, by virtue of the payment of such dues, is entitled to receive a copy of the order's paper.

Mr. DODDS. In words it includes only the members of the society, order, or union, and exchanges and bona fide subscribers, together with the 10 per cent for sample copies.

Mr. SHERLEY. Can the gentleman read just the part of his amendment that deals with this particular point?

Mr. DODDS. Certainly; I will read it:

Provided, That the circulation through the mails of periodical publications, issued by benevolent or fraternal societies or orders, or by trades-unions, strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, as second-class matter, shall be limited to copies mailed to members, exchanges, and bona fide subscribers, together with ten per centum of such circulation in addition as sample copies.

Mr. SHERLEY. In other words, it does not make the right to second-class privileges dependent at all upon the number of subscribers as the Post Office Department construes the word

Mr. DODDS. It does the same in that respect as the law of

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am not sufficiently familiar with that law to know to just what the gentleman refers. Here is a proposition that was up before the department. A paper was denied the second-class mail privilege upon the ground that its subscription was not a bona fide subscription, that the subscribers were not real subscribers, but were simply members of an order, who got the paper by virtue of being members. I want to know if that rule is changed by this amendment.

Mr. DODDS. It would be denied under the law of 1879, but under the law of 1894, which is as follows, it would not be de-

All periodical publications issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals and as frequently as four times a year, by or under the auspices of a benevolent or fraternal society or order organized under the lodge system and having a bona fide membership of not less than one thousand persons, or by a regularly incorporated institution of learning, or by or under the auspices of a trades union, and all publications of strictly professional, literary, historical, or scientific societies, including the bulletins issued by State boards of health, shall be admitted to the mails as second-class matter and the postage thereon shall be the same as on other second-class matter and no more: Provided, further, That such matter shall be originated and published to further the objects and purposes of such society, order, trades union, or institution of learning, and shall be formed of printed paper sheets without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

That is the provision of the law of 1894, and does away with the necessity of getting the subscribers required by the law of

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, if this does not do any more than the law of 1894, what is the use of passing it?

Mr. DODDS. It does more.
Mr. SHERLEY. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. DODDS. It allows these periodicals to carry advertising matter, in a limited way.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, in other words, you have changed the law of 1894 by enlarging it so as to include papers that also carry advertisements-

Mr. DODDS. That is what this does.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes additional.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the Chair that there is no time limit on the gentleman, there is a point of order being reserved, and the gentleman is practically speaking by unanimous consent.

The Chair will state to the gentleman The CHAIRMAN. from Kentucky that it has been the practice when the point of order was raised to hold gentlemen to the five-minute rule, and the Chair is endeavoring to enforce that practice. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman now specifically provides that fraternal organization papers may be sent to members of the fraternal organization as second-class matter.

Mr. DODDS. It does. Mr. MANN. So it obviates the question of bona fide subscribers to the amount of 50 per cent, which is required of the other papers which were granted the second-class mail privilege.

Mr. DODDS. It does away with the objections referred to and gives the right, as I stated a moment ago, to carry advertising matter.

Mr. MANN. It would not require, as I understand, that a member of the fraternal organization should subscribe for the publication.

Mr. DODDS. It does not under this provision.

Mr. MANN. It may be sent to them free, or may be sent to them because of the dues which they pay to the organization.

Mr. DODDS. Under such regulations as the organization may see fit to make.

Mr. MANN. But I am not certain it is entirely free from doubt as to the wording, and I want that statement to go in the RECORD for the benefit of officers who have to construe the law

Mr. TILSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan if he would make a little more clear the provision as to advertising and its limitation. What limitation is there in the gentleman's amendment as to the amount of advertising which these publications may carry and allow them to be admissible at the second-class rate?

Mr. DODDS. The amendment provides that the publication shall have the right to carry advertising matter, whether such matter pertains to such benevolent or fraternal societies or orders, literary, historical, or scientific societies, or to other institutions, or concerns.

Mr. TILSON. Is it unlimited in amount? Can one of these journals carry an unlimited amount of advertising?

Mr. DODDS. It is not unlimited in amount. that the periodicals shall not be designed or published primarily for advertising purposes; that the carrying of the advertising must be incidental—just the same regulation as applies to general periodicals, or substantially the same.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee make the point of order?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, was there not an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Pennsylvania started to offer an amendment on that and I thought he would. If the Chair will withhold the putting of the question I would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I offer this amendment to the amendment after the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan has been passed?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. Mr. DODDS. The request is that his amendment be offered after my amendment is passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has not yet been passed. The Chair was in the act of putting the question and the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the amendment, and without objection the Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if there is no objection I will read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will have to read it after the gentleman has read it, and the gentleman had better send it up for reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment:
"Provided, That all the privileges of second-class mail matter herein extended to benevolent and fraternal societies be also extended on similar terms to religious societies and associations issuing newspapers and magazines."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman have any idea how far that would go? It is a rather hastily prepared amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would have a very wide effect. There is no question about that, but the other proposition is equally wide.

Mr. MANN. The other proposition is pretty well guarded, I will say to the gentleman, as he would see if he had examined the bill, which I have studied a number of times when introduced on the floor. Supposing some one now who is de-prived of the use of the second-class privilege, publishing some paper, organizes what is called religious societies, and thereupon proceeds to claim the benefit of the second-class matter for a purely advertising sheet? How can it be shut out under the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. BORLAND. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I would say that this provision in regard to religious publications is carried in exactly the same order as the provision in reference to fraternal publications. It must be issued from the known place of publication. It must be issued at least four times a year, and so forth. There are the same safeguards exactly, and no others, that exist as to fraternal orders.

Mr. MANN. As to the fraternal propositions, this amendment provides that the fraternal organizations must have a thousand bona fide members. That is one proposition. It is quite a different proposition to say that anybody can issue an advertising sheet, call it the organ of some imagined religious name, and issue what they please under the second-class privi-

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it is fair to say to the gentleman that that is not contemplated by the amendment. The amendment to the amendment suggests the same conditions that are imposed upon beneficial and fraternal orders shall be imposed upon religious organizations.

Mr. MANN. I saw that part of it, but I do not think it amounts to anything. I understand what the gentleman desires to accomplish. But here is a proposition offered on the floor that, if it gets into the law, will be the law. The question is, What does it say? The gentleman knows that the Post Office Department is in a constant fight with people who are issuing purely advertising sheets for advertising purposes only, and endeavoring to secure the second-class privilege to transmit their advertisements at the expense of the people of the United States. And any proposition ought to be safely guarded. supposed the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Borland] had a bill which probably would cover it. I do not believe the gentleman's amendment covers it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That also seems to be the idea of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Dopps]. If the effect of my amendment on his amendment would be to defeat his amendment, I prefer to withdraw mine and then take the question up with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], who has a bill covering this point.

Mr. MANN. I think that would be better.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the amendment.
Mr. BORLAND. I offer the same amendment, then.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Borland], which is the same as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the "noes" seemed to have it. seemed to have it.

Mr. BORLAND. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were-ayes 4, noes 20.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Dopps].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment in order to perfect the language of the bill, to follow the suggestion of the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

On line 3, page 2 of the amendment, after the word "by," insert the words "or under the auspices of." $\,$

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, that can only be done by unanimous consent. What is the purpose of that? Mr. DODDS. Mr. DODDS. We only place here the other language elsewhere in the bill—"under the auspices of."

Mr. MANN. That was in the other part. Mr. DODDS. It ought to be repeated in this part.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment for the same purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Dodds] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 4, page 2 of the amendment, after the word "orders," strike out the comma and insert the word "or,"

Mr. DODDS. That just carries the same provision to the trade-unions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan. The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment for the same purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Dodds] offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 4, page 2 of the amendment, after the comma and before the word "strictly," insert the words "or by."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. DODDS. I offer the following amendment for the same purpose. The CHAIRMAN, The gentleman from Michigan IMr.

Dopps] offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report, The Clerk read as follows:

On line 13, page 2 of the amendment, after the word "further," strike out the words "their own" and insert the word "the."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment for the same purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Dodds] asks unanimous consent to offer another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 13, page 2 of the amendment, after the word "purposes" and before the comma, insert the words "of such benevolent or fraternal societies or orders, trade-unions, or other societies."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amend-

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bor-LAND] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. Where does the gentleman propose that it shall go in the bill?

Mr. BORLAND. At the end of the last word of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MANN. That amendment is not subject to amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. It follows the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment as a new paragraph, after the word "dollars." The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the privileges herein given to fraternal and benevolent associations are hereby extended to religious societies or associations which comply with the same requirement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment is offered by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I make the point of order on that.

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bor-LAND] asks unanimous consent to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Dodds].

Mr. BORLAND. No; it should be a proviso. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee objects. Mr. DODDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Dodds] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr.

Moore] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph the following;
"That mallable matter of the second class shall embrace every newspaper or other periodical publication issued by or under the auspices of a religious or charitable society or organization: Provided, That such publication complies with the requirements and conditions of section 420 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For blanks, books, and printed matter of urgent or special character, including the preparation, publication, and free distribution by post-masters to the public of a pamphlet containing general postal information, intaglio seals, and other miscellaneous items of immediate necessity for the registry system, $4,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to transfer to the paragraph which we passed under the head of the "Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General" these words: "For expenses of agency for inspection of manufacture of official envelopes at Cincinnati, Ohio, $5,700." I ask that the item be transferred to this part of the bill under the "Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General," where it helongs

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to transpose lines 17, 18, and 19, on page 24, to come in on page 25, after the word "dollars," in line 20. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers, substitutes for carriers on annual leave, clerks in charge of substations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, $43,375,000: Provided, That not to exceed $20,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for compensation of clerks in charge of substations.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a day or two ago we passed a provision for the payment of the mail carriers on Lake Winnepesaukee. There was a mistake made in that amendment. I ask unanimous consent that we go back to page 16, line 25, to strike out that amendment which was agreed to the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] asks unanimous consent to return to page 16, line 25, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will offer his amendment. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The amendment is to strike out the amendment that was agreed to by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following in page 16, line 25:
"Provided, That in the discretion of the Postmaster General the pay of the carrier on the water route on Lake Winnepesaukee, who furnishes his own power boat for mail service during the summer months, may be fixed at an amount not exceeding the maximum salary allowed rural carriers by law in any one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting, after the word "station," in line 21, page 27, the following, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, after line 21, insert:
"Provided further, That in the discretion of the Postmaster General the pay of the carrier on the water route on Lake Winnepesaukee, who furnishes his own power boat for mail service during the summer months, may be fixed at an amount not exceeding the maximum salary allowed rural carriers by law in any one calendar year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, line 18, after the word "dollars," amend by inserting the following:
"Provided, That the Postmaster General shall allow extra compensation to carriers for closed-pouch service."

I reserve a point of order on that. Mr. MANN.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, there are a great many closed pouch rural mail carriers. My attention has been called particularly to certain cases in my own district, and one of them was investigated a few days ago. The investigation covered three days, and the department had not yet finished the investigation when the report was made to me.

The closed pouch carried by the carrier from the city of Hastings, in my district, on a route running out of Hastings, through the town of Dowling, contained, during the three days investigated, an average of 281 packages, and the average weight of the closed pouch for the three days was 97 pounds. In addition to this pouch to the town of Dowling the carrier is making the regular delivery on his route, and the investigation showed that the average number of pieces delivered by him along his route, outside the mail destined for Dowling, for the three days was 290. There are 117 boxes on the route. It seems to me perfectly apparent that a service which requires a carrier, without additional compensation, to carry a closed pouch daily, thereby imposing a duty which other carriers over the various routes out of the same post office do not have to the various routes out of the same post office do not have to perform, where the average weight, as in this case for illustration, is 97 pounds a day, is unfair, and that there ought to be some means provided in the law whereby these men who are performing this extra service every day in the year may receive some compensation for it. Not only should all carriers receive more than they are now receiving, but carriers of closed pouches about described acceptance of the same post should receive proper extra compensation therefor.

I have always appreciated our splendid rural mail service as I know the gentleman from Kansas does.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Here is the case of a carrier taking a Mr. MURDOCK. closed pouch with 97 pounds of mail in it from Hastings to

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Of course he carries that closed pouch for nothing?

Mr. HAMIL/TON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman know what the cost of the carriage of the same kind of mail between Hastings and Dowling was when that was a star route, as it undoubtedly was at some time?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I took the pains to inquire into that and I have a letter here concerning the cost of the former star route. It is as follows:

APRIL 15, 1912.

Hon. E. L. Hamilton, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: With reference to your inquiry of to-day concerning the cost of the star route by which the post office at Dowling, Barry County, Mich., was supplied, I beg to inform you that from July 1, 1903, service was performed on star route No. 37183, from Cedar Creek by Dowling and Pritchardville to Hastings, 14.75 miles and back, six times a week, at the rate of $450 per annum. This star route was discontinued from September 30, 1903, and since that date the office at Dowling has been supplied by closed pouch on rural route No. 4, from Hastings, Mich.

Very truly, yours,

P. V. De Graw,

Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

P. V. DE GRAW, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. MURDOCK. The point that I want to bring out is that here is one instance where the rural route between two places costs the Government $500. It used to cost $500 on a star route and now it only costs $1,000 on a rural route. route serves the star-route terminal and the intervening territory in addition.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Apparently. But there ought to be discretionary power somewhere to give the Postmaster General authority to allow extra compensation. It is perfectly clear that it is unfair to ask a carrier to do this extra work without such compensation. I have no doubt that the same condition exists in many other towns. I suppose in nearly every district represented here on the floor by gentlemen present in the Committee of the Whole there are cases of this kind, and there ought to be some means provided where some compensation can be allowed in these cases within the discretion of the Postmaster General.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan is rather a singular one. The carrier, no matter who he may be, is employed by the Government to do the work that is to be done in the territory. It does not seem to me to make any difference whether he carries a closed pouch or open packages of mail, he ought to be paid the compensation allowed by law. If we are going to have a system of paying extras to certain classified men in the service for every additional package they are called upon to carry, the department will never know exactly what it is going to cost to do the work.

This bill provides an extra compensation of $74 a year for a rural carrier over what he is now getting. This proposition was considered in the committee, thoroughly canvassed, and it was the judgment of the men who gave it careful consideration that there ought to be no exceptions whatever made for any service by any rural carrier; that all men should be treated alike.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly. Mr. HAMII/TON of Michigan. In the course of the investigation which the gentleman has made has he found cases where the carriers of closed pouches have found it necessary to provide more horses to perform the service on that account?

Mr. MADDEN. Various statements were made by men who wanted extra pay for everything that they were called upon Some men say that it takes three horses to do the work that they are called upon to perform, while other men say that one horse is sufficient. Some men think that they ought to be allowed $350 extra for horse hire, in addition to the pay they are now receiving, and some think they should get higher pay than they are now getting and then be allowed an extra price for horse hire, to be fixed by the Government.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman again

yleid?

Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Has the gentleman's atten-tion been called to occasions where carriers of closed pouches were obliged to provide larger vehicles on that account?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, they make all sorts of claims for all to be any system of conducting the department except on a flat compensation to be paid under the law; that no man appointed as a rural carrier should be placed in a position where he is able to demand extra pay for extra packages carried.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MADDEN. I will yield to the gentleman. Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Suppose the gentleman had in his employment men whose business it was to carry parcels, and he had a regular schedule of wages. Would he regard it as fair to require one of these men to carry twice as much as any of the other men at the same wage he was paying the other men?

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that there is no man employed as a rural carrier who is called upon to do any very great amount of extra work. Every one of these men are required to do only what is fair, and they are being well paid for what they do. None of them are over-worked. The department ought not to be compelled to fix a scale of extra compensation for carrying additional packages. The men employed by the Government should be compelled to carry whatever packages are given them to carry along the routes, and they ought to be compelled to carry them at the compensation in the bill.

I do not believe in this thing of fixing extras where every man comes in and claims that he has done extra work. If you do it for one man, you will do it for every man, and nobody will know what the cost of carrying the mail will be. The depart-ment will be in a state of chaos. There will be no system about ment will be in a state of chaos. There will be no system about it. Rural carriers will be dictating to the department just when they will carry a sufficient load, and they will tell the department how many packages they are to carry, whether in a closed pouch or in an open package. They will insist they can not be compelled to carry more than 100 pounds, and some will insist they can not be compelled to carry more than 50 pounds. In any case, there will be a question of doubt as to what shall be done and who shall have the authority to order it done. the men are employed they ought to be compelled to do just exactly what there is to do and to receive for what they do the compensation fixed by law, without any possibility of being given an opportunity to make application for extra pay for additional work.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, at different times there has been urged upon the Post Office Department and upon Congress the desirability of changing star routes into rural carrier districts. In many of those rural carrier routes the amount of mail delivered is not very great, a large share of the service being the carrying of locked pouches, which originally and formerly were carried by the star-route service. The gentleman now proposes that he shall pay in all of those cases the regular salary to the rural carrier and then, in addition, pay for the locked pouch or the star-route service. Of course the inevitable result of that will be, if it be adopted as a policy of Congress, that the Post Office Department will not change a star route into a rural delivery district, if the expense is to be greater, and people will thereby be deprived of the privilege of receiving their mail through the rural routes where star routes now exist. We do not establish the principle of paying rural carriers according to the amount of mail carried, and it ought not to be done.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does not the department require a certain amount of mail to be carried over a rural delivery route, and if it falls below the requirement do they not reduce the number of trips per week? There is a standard amount of mail required in order to maintain a six days' rural free-delivery route.

Mr. MANN. Considering the fact that they do not count the packages or weigh the mail, I do not see how they enforce any such provision if they have one.

Mr. AUSTIN. I know in a number of instances in the district that I represent the department has discontinued or reduced the number of trips from six to three trips per week, giving as a reason that the amount of mail collected on that route falls below the minimum requirements of the department.

Mr. MANN. Oh, very likely. They endeavor to use some common sense in reference to such matters, but they do not establish as a basis for the paying of the rural carriers the amount of mail which is carried, and ought not to, in my judgment.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is the length of the route that fixes the compensation now.

Mr. MANN. The length of the route fixes the compensation, sorts of things; but there must be some discretion somewhere, and in creating new routes they take into consideration the and we should call a halt here. It seems to me there ought not number of people to be served, and the probable amount of mail to be carried, as they ought to do; but now to propose when you transfer a star route into a rural carrier route, for the benefit of people living along the route upon the theory that the carrier can do both just as easily as one, and then turn around and seek to pay the full limit for the rural carrier and in addition thereto the amount originally paid to the star-route service seems to me to be extravagant.

Mr. HAMIL/TON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I fancy from what the gentleman has said that he perhaps does not fully appreciate the facts in this matter. Here is a case where a man is carrying all the mail that any other carrier is carrying out of a particular office. He is doing just as much work as any other carrier, and in addition to that every day in the year he is carrying this locked pouch. I am not left to conjecture in this I have submitted an inquiry to the department, and the department has made an investigation, and it turns out that this pouch weighs about 100 pounds every day and contains 281 pieces.

This is in addition to the regular work of the carriers. This is a long preliminary, but I will get the gentleman's time extended-ought not there to be-

Mr. MANN. I am not complaining. Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I submit to the gentleman, who I regard as a fair man, ought not there to be some way to make compensation in those cases?

Mr. MANN. I see no occasion for it. Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Then I will have to withdraw my statement about the gentleman being a fair man. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I will leave that to others not so much interested as the gentleman from Michigan in this particular case. Here is a case where a star route for the convenience of the people was transferred to a rural-carrier route, and when he commenced the service which the gentleman now speaks of that was required the rural carrier performing this service was not required to accept the position. He knew what was required of him

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No; the gentleman is in error. The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan to make

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. This additional service was added after the carrier had entered the service, and I have here pictures showing that this carrier has to habitually have a larger conveyance than other carriers, and his ordinary load in bulk is easily three times as large as other carriers, and there is nothing fair about it.

Mr. MADDEN. If that carrier had been as industrious in doing his work as in getting pictures there would not be this

Mr. MANN. I do not undertake to say that this particular carrier might not properly receive more money—

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Thank you for that.
Mr. MANN. But it is entirely out of the question for a great administrative department of the Government to make fish of one and fowl of another, and you can not make your general rule applicable to these cases which would apply to this par-ticular case without covering a whole lot of cases that have no justice in them at all. Now, converting the route to a rural-carrier route for the convenience of the people is no reason why we should pay an additional amount.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, the gentleman from Michigan wants this man to be paid because somebody else gets equal pay for a less amount of service in weight.

Mr. MANN. For less service; that is the proposition. Mr. CANNON. I suppose that that would involve the proposition of finding out the smallest route in the United States in mail that is carried and make that the standard and have everybody carry the same weight. Is that involved in this?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Nobody is advocating any such ridiculous proposition as that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not advocating that, although that is fairly true of the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. This harmony between the gentlemen from Illinois is pleasing, but they have agreed upon an entirely erroneous premise.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow one further word?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know how many carriers there are in my district; it is completely covered.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I warrant you. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. It is completely covered. Mr. MANN. And thoroughly settled up.

Mr. CANNON. Thoroughly settled. Now, the trouble with me is I see considerable trouble ahead if this practice is adopted-that I shall have claims for special legislation and have to take them up one by one-

Mr. MADDEN. The get to the Postmaster General The gentleman would have to go every day

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. If gentlemen could only get to understand what this proposition is, they would not talk in the air so much-

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MANN. I do not yield to anybody, and I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That if the revenues of the Post Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, a sum equal to such deficiency of the revenue of said department is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply said deficiencies in the revenues for the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1913, and the sum needed may be advanced to the Post Office Department upon requisition of the Postmaster General.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, in taking time during the general debate on the Post Office bill to discuss the subject of good roads, I feel that I am not only dealing with a subject of prime importance to the great postal service, but to every national interest. I have no hesitation in saying that there is no one subject of greater importance to-day to the entire producing and commercial interests of the Nation than that of good roads. The interest is so widespread throughout the United States that it needs no words of mine to emphasize it. All Members of Congress admit the supreme and immediate importance of the subject, and the only difference of opinion has been whether it is properly one of national or local character. There is no doubt in my mind that it is national; as national as any of the great activities of the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce and Labor, or the Department of the Interior. It bears a more general and intimate relation to the welfare of the people of the entire Nation than any of the bureaus now operated under national authority. It is more national than the Forest Service, more national than the irrigation of arid lands, more national than the work of the Bureau of Animal Industry, the Bureau of Plant Industry, the Bureau of Mines, the Bureau of Immigration, the Bureau of Manufactures, and the Bureau of Corporations. It is as national in its character as the improvement of the rivers and harbors or the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It deals with the most primal aspect of the great subject of transportation, which, in such a vast country as ours, is the greatest national subject of internal administration. The care of highways has been a national matter with every nation from the moment of its first emergence from savagery into an orderly development toward commercial civilization and self-government. The great highways of Rome bound her to her most distant colony, and over them marched the invincible legions that conquered the world. Backward along the same highways flew the fleet messengers, with relays of Arabian horses, which formed the first great national and international posts.

The care of the highways is national in France, a land possessing the most beautiful roadways in the world. That country has divided her highways into three classes—the national trunk lines, the great provincial main roads, and the local highways or lanes. This classification is scientific and is the basis for a splendid system of administrative law and a fair distribution of the cost of construction and maintenance.

For more than a century of our national life we have been trying to solve this national problem by a system of isolated We borrowed from the old English common law local control. a doctrine which grew up at a time when England was practically a hermit nation without arts or commerce-that the control of the highways is a mere neighborhood matter, to be attended to by the township or the hundred. We have presented the amusing spectacle of trying to adapt this obsolete principle of the common law to a vast undeveloped country 3,000 miles in extent, the richest and most fertile stretch of country of any government on the face of the globe.

At one time there was a serious doubt in the minds of the American statesmen whether the Federal Government had legal power to aid in the construction of highways. That doubt has long since disappeared. There is no legal proposition better settled by the Supreme Court of the United States than that the Federal Government has power to engage in the construction and maintenance of interstate highways. The power is ample, whether under the express terms of the Constitution, which gives Congress the power to establish post offices and post roads, or under the clause which gives to the Federal Government control over commerce between the several States. question was determined in the affirmative when the Federal Government undertook to aid in the construction of the Pacific railroads. The Supreme Court, in one of these cases, said as follows:

Mithout authority in Congress to establish and maintain such highways and bridges, it would be without authority to regulate one of the most important adjuncts of commerce. This power in former times was exerted to a very limited extent, the Cumberland, or national road, being the most notable instance. Its extension was but little called for, as commerce was then mostly conducted by water, and many of our statesmen entertained doubts as to the existence of the power to establish ways of communication by land. But since, in consequence of the expansion of the country, the multiplication of its products, and the invention of railroads and locomotion by steam, land transportation has so vastly increased, a sounder consideration of the subject has prevailed and led to the conclusion that Congress has plenary power over the whole subject. (California v. Pacific Railroad Co., 127 U. S., 1, lc, 39.)

Later cases are to the same effect:

Congress has likewise the power, exercised early in this century by successive acts in the Cumberland or National Road, from the Potomac across the Alleghanies to the Ohio, to authorize the construction of a public highway connecting several States. (Lucton v. North River Bridge Co., 153 U. S., 525-529; Indiana v. U. S., 148 U. S., 148.)

All of these are cited with approval in the case of Wilson v. Shaw (204 U.S., 33), in which it was determined that the Federal Government had power to construct, maintain, and operate the Panama Canal.

It is a matter of familiar history that when the Federal Constitution was framed the thirteen Colonies were all connected by sea or navigable streams which were arms of the sea, and no general system of land communication existed. The States gave up to the Federal Government the power to levy tonnage duties, which each State had previously been in the habit of levying for the purpose of maintaining its own works of internal improvement, such as the care of its rivers and harbors. The rivers and harbors were at that time the great, and practically the exclusive, agency of interstate communication. The view, therefore, that it was the intention to endow the Federal Government with plenary power over the means of interstate communication is now considered as a sound view of the Constitution. It is a matter of history, also, for that for a hundred years after the foundation of the Constitution—that is to say, from 1787 to 1887—it was the opinion of many statesmen and most lawyers that the clause of the Federal Constitution which clothed the Federal Government with the power over interstate commerce was only negative, or restrictive, in its character; that its only effect was to prevent injurious discrimination by the several States against commerce or traffic of the other States or the foreign nations, and that its full force was exerted in preventing and restraining such discrimination. In 1887, however, this view was entirely reversed, and Congress took the position that the interstate commerce clause was an affirmative grant of power to the Federal Government and would justify affirmative legislation regulating the agencies of commerce. therefore passed the interstate commerce bill, the first affirmative exercise of its power. I need not tell you how rapidly this new conception of the Federal power over interstate commerce has grown since 1887, or how deeply embedded it is now in all national legislation.

It being clear, then, that the power exists with the Federal Government, that it is affirmative in its character and ample in its scope, and that it applies directly to the subject of good roads, we are then confronted with the question, which is always one of legislative discretion, whether the time has arrived for the exercise of such power in that behalf. I think there is no one subject in the whole scope of governmental activity that is so directly related with the prosperity of the producer in the country and which is so uniformly national in its character as the subject of good roads. The rural highway is the primary and universal agency of transportation. It leads from every farm to every market, and over it passes annually the food supplies of the Nation. Not only does it carry to market the food supplies and raw material for domestic consumption, but it is balance of trade in our favor and bring to our shores the golden stream of wealth must begin its journey on the rural highway. I will not stop to discuss the intricate problem as to who pays the cost of transportation, whether it be the producer or the consumer. Unquestionably, in the aggregate, the consumer pays the cost of transportation, and every wage earner in the cities must pay every penny of the cost to get the food to his dinner table. But the contrary may be true as to export trade, and in such case the producer must pay the cost of transportation, because he must sell his goods in the open markets of the world under conditions of strictest competition, of which distance and transportation are always a part. Without attempting to solve this economic problem, I feel sure that if our farmers could get their products to the seaboard at a lower cost a larger proportion of the ultimate price would remain in their pockets and would result in building up the wealth of the country by entering into all the channels of local trade. I am satisfied also that with better conditions of rural highways the wage earners in the cities would find a lower cost of living, with better and more abundant supplies, without reducing the ultimate value now realized to the farmer who produces the crop. In other words, a high and unnecessary cost of transportation is an economic loss to the entire Nation. I will not weary you with figures as to the relative cost of traffic over rural highways as compared with railroad and water haul.

It is sufficient to say that it forms an absurdly large percentage of the entire cost of handling the article in proportion to the distance transported, and that this is due entirely to the unimproved and unscientific condition of the highways, which results from isolated local control.

I need not emphasize the importance of rural highways as an aid to the postal service. If there is any branch of the service which has fully justified itself by results it is rural free delivery. I hold it to be true that in our common country, where we all labor together to produce the national wealth and all must bear a share of the burden of taxation, we are all entitled to the national facilities and advantages. The farmer is as much entitled to the daily delivery of mail to his doorstep as the dweller in the city. It is not only a matter of right, but a matter of national importance in a free Republic such as ours. Intelligence of all kinds ought to be widely distributed. Books, newspapers, literature, political intelligence, market reports, and all information relating to commerce and politics should be spread broadcast throughout the land. The work of the postal department is to supply the winged feet of Mercury, the messenger of the gods, and bring the message to every American sovereign. The light of intelligence and information, the news of the progress of the world, and the messages from loved ones should flash to the fartherest corner which ac-knowledges the jurisdiction of Uncle Sam. The postal service is like a great golden thread—running to the fartherest hill farm in the most remote county in the Union and binding the whole Nation together. There is no bond of union so strong as the postal service, which knows no East, no West, no North, no South.

Perhaps it is unnecessary also for me to emphasize the fact that one of the greatest economic problems confronting our Nation to-day is the enormous growth of the cities at the expense of the country district and the small town. Not alone the population, but the wealth of the country continues to concentrate in the cities. This wealth was originally drawn from the country districts as the population of the cities was drawn from the country districts, but under our system neither the wealth nor the population returns or tends to return to the rural community. It is a constant, steady, and exhausting drain upon the great underlying base of national prosperity and national moral and political life. It is a grave question how long the national wealth will stand such a drain.

One of the best results which will come from the improvement of rural highways is the turning back again this stream of population and wealth toward the rural district and the small town. Motor vehicles of all kinds are here to stay and have become a permanent fixture of American life. They make it possible, with the aid of good roads, to establish country homes for people of wealth or even moderate circumstances in the rural sections within an increasing radius of the great cities. small towns will become commercially active and socially attractive, and will be, as they should be, delightful places of residence for the American citizen and healthful and attractive for his wife and children. A constant passage of city people back and forth through the country districts will distribute a large share of trade in the money spent for pleasure or business.

I need not emphasize, of course, the supreme advantage that good roads would be to the farmer himself, making his labor easier, his life more pleasant, his farm more valuable, and rethe first step in international commerce. The great export serving to him a larger share in the fruits of his toll. The wealth of the Nation that must find its way abroad to turn the matter before the American Congress in language which is clear and unmistakable. I need only quote a brief extract from an article by Howard H. Gross, secretary of Farmers' Good Roads League of Illinois, appearing recently in the Saturday Evening Post:

Post:

The need of the hour is the road builder, and in no part of the continent is the need greater than in the Mississippi Valley, the granary of the world. In all that vast expanse from Pittsburgh to Denver and from the Lakes to the Gulf is a land of surpassing fertility and almost boundless possibilities, peopled with men and women of marvelous energy, hopeful, self-reliant, and prosperous beyond compare. Within two generations they have conquered the wilderness, swept the wigwam from the prairie, and placed in its stead the comfortable, modern farm home. They have crossed and recrossed this great area with rallroads over which the traffic of an empire is carried. Is it not strange that a people who have given such splendid proof of their capacity to do great things should fail so signally in dealing with the public roads? The greatest difficulty in building good roads is not the actual construction or even the paying for them, but convincing the people locally that it can be done without burdensome or rulnous taxation. No community ever began the building of stone or gravel roads, usually called hard roads, without the most bitter opposition from farmers who would most argely benefit by the improvement. It is encouraging to know that no community ever began the building of hard roads that did not keep on doing so. When the taxpayers had had the experience of using the roads and paying for them, more roads were demanded, and soon those most violently opposed were found on the firing line fighting for more appropriations for road improvement.

It is said that however desirable good roads may be their con-

It is said that however desirable good roads may be their construction and maintenance is the sole business of the man whose land fronts on the road or the neighborhood which uses the highway. In the public improvements conducted in the cities it has been found that the construction and, to some extent, the maintenance of the improvements in the streets are a matter of such local benefit to the abutting property that their cost within any reasonable limit is promptly absorbed in the in-creased value of the adjoining land. Most American cities recognize this principle as to the construction of streets, though some hold that the maintenance of the streets after the construction is a matter for the common expense of the entire community. I confess that it puzzled me somewhat when I first began to study the subject of rural highways why this principle did not apply to the construction and maintenance of such That it does not apply is clearly evident from the fact that we have been proceeding upon this principle for more than a hundred years and have found it to be a complete and utter failure, whereas cities have found it to be a complete and satisfactory solution of the problem. I have at length come to the conclusion that the principle can not be justly applied to the construction of the country highways. Generally speaking, city property is valuable on account of its location and accessibility. If it has these advantages almost any use can be made of the property, and the limit of rent or productive value has never yet been reached. An unsafe, unimproved, dilapidated condition of the street in front of city property almost immediately destroys its entire value. We begin to see, therefore, why there is no analogy with farm property. The farm property is not only the basis of the wealth of the farmer who occupies it, but the basis of the wealth of the entire Nation. As a Nation we are interested in using every available foot of productive land in the United States for the growth of our national wealth, for the food of our great industrial army of workers, and for the supply of our great industrial trade. We can not afford to allow land to remain undeveloped or to remain inaccessible, or to put a burden upon the producer which he is While it is true in a general way that an unable to meet. improvement of a highway raises the value of the surrounding land, it is also true that a large amount of the wealth raised upon the land must be divided by the farmer with his fellow man in the cities.

The farmer can not retain all of the increased wealth from his He must divide with the implement men, the general merchant, the railroad, the factor, the wholesaler, the manufacturer, and in may cases with the exporter. The farmer can not be asked therefore to assume the initial expense of the vast means of industrial intercourse. He has a right to divide this with the cities who divide with him the profits of his business. The business men of the cities have come to realize this condition, and in the great commercial center of Kansas City, Mo., which I represent, they have learned both by observation and experience that the improvement of the rural highways is a direct and important source of wealth to the cities. County, Mo., the county which surrounds Kansas City, there is to-day nearly 300 miles of the most highly improved country highways, surfaced with rock and treated with oil, constituting a great connected system of beautiful boulevards. They are not only a source of pleasure, health, and enjoyment to the people of Kansas City, and have not only raised vastly the value of the suburban property, but they are a direct source of wealth in the increase of trade and the abundance and cheapness of market supplies for the wage earner and housekeeper.

But I have yet to touch upon one of the most beautiful results that I believe would follow from the improvement of our national highways. The building of good roads in every direction which will form continuous routes of trunk lines across the continent, joined by such local highways leading into every section of the country, will open up our land to its own citizens as nothing else will do. It will show America to Americans and instill a broader patriotism and a deeper love of the country, founded upon a truer and wider knowledge. sending abroad every year thousands of Americans with millions of dollars to see the beauties, natural and historic, of We are fortunate that our country is not able to show the wrecks of feudal power. The commanding points along our great rivers were never marked by frowning towers that showed the limits of some petty state. The hills above our fair valleys were never crowned by the feudal castles of the lord. The history of our country happily began in a different and nobler age of human life. Europe has her charms, artistic and historic, worthy of the attention of any American, and to see them in their true light and in their historic prospective will make any man a better American and prouder of his own free

But for natural beauty we are blessed beyond any land under the sun. The hand of nature's God has adorned this country with all the splendors of mountain and sea, forest and plain. Our country, too, is not without its historic associations, its sacred shrines and its hallowed spots, its scenes of crucial battles, and its humble birthplaces of the Nation's great. It is time that Americans should turn their attention to their own land. See America first" should be the rule of all patriotic citizens. Not only see America first, but see America at all events, for we must remember that thousands upon thousands of Americans have no opportunity to leave their employment to indulge in extensive travel, even if they had the money. Such recreation, travel, and enjoyment as most of the citizens may find must be in their own land, and unless we make it possible and attractive to indulge such tastes, we are depriving our citizens of a large share of the natural right to which we are all entitled in the enjoyment of our common country.

The good roads through the Swiss mountains are dotted with students, professional men, and mechanics on foot who are traveling from place to place to enjoy the scenery and to strengthen their bodily and mental faculties. There is no limit of time, equipment, or purse in the enjoyment of a beautiful highway. It is equally free to the richest and the humblest, and although one man may use it with all the advantage of wealth to a much greater extent than his neighbor, still the use by the neighbor will be just as free and just as full as his own means or inclinations will permit.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago an amendment was offered to this bill, on page 14. The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise? Mr. FOSTER. I want to get unanimous consent as soon as can to state a proposition. The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to address the committee? Mr. FOSTER. I would like to state the proposition just for moment, and I ask unanimous consent to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foster] asks unanimous consent to make a statement to the committee.

Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Two or three days ago an amendment was offered, on page 14, line 21, providing that in the future only $270 a year should be paid for the rental of canceling machines, and it was thought that this amendment might interfere with contracts already in existence; and I want to ask unanimous consent that this provision might be inserted or that we return to that paragraph

Provided, That hereafter no contract shall be made for rental of any canceling machine for more than $270 per annum, including repairs on said machine, and that all contracts entered into shall be let after having advertised for bids and shall be awarded on the basis of cheapness and efficiency.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. That is to take the place

Mr. FOSTER. Of the proviso that is there now.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman offered such an amendment the other day, if you remember, and withdrew it.
Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; it was adopted.
Mr. MURDOCK. The amendment was not adopted, as I understand it, on the objection of the gentleman from Illinois, that it interfered with existing contracts.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I am trying to correct now Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if his purpose is not to remedy the error that was made the other day as to existing contracts?

Mr. FOSTER. That is the purpose of the amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foster] asks unanimous consent to return to a certain portion of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for a moment. I think the gentleman does not want to strike out the proviso:

Provided. That the rental paid for any canceling machine shall not exceed $300 per annum, including repairs on said machine.

I think that ought to remain in; and then the gentleman's amendment that the contract should not be let for over $270.

Mr. FOSTER. That hereafter all contracts shall not be let for over $270, the gentleman means?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. That would not interfere with the contracts already in existence if that proviso was changed in this regard.

Mr. MANN. Possibly not. Mr. FOSTER. It refers to contracts in the future and, I think, does not have anything to do with the present contracts.

Mr. MANN. The present contracts are guarded because none of them exceed $300.

Mr. FOSTER. This simply says that hereafter no contract shall be made.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.
Mr. BOWMAN. In referring to the top of page 15, where it SAYS:

After having advertised for bids-would you understand for the purchase of machines? Ought it not to include the words "for rental and purchase"?

Mr. MANN. That is another proposition entirely. I do not think we should put it in here.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer the amendment, Mr. Chairman. N. Where does the gentleman wish it inserted? This proviso takes the place of the present Mr. FOSTER. proviso in line 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment strikes out the proviso and offers the following, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 21, amend by striking out the provise and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"Provided, That hereafter no contract shall be made for a cancelling machine for more than $270 per annum, including repairs on said machine, and that all contracts entered into shall be let after having advertised for bids and shall be awarded on the basis of cheapness and efficiency."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the committee for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Fowler] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, on last Saturday, while discussing the Post Office appropriation bill, I offered an amendment for the purpose of correcting the punctuation of a certain paragraph. After the amendment was offered my colleges from Illinois [Mr. Mayn] made some statements with tain paragraph. After the amendment was offered my colleague from Illinois [Mr. Mann] made some statements with reference to the propriety of offering amendments for the purpose of correcting punctuation, and among other things he said it was the duty of the enrolling and engrossing clerk to punctuate the bill properly after its passage.

I then informed him that in the past he had repeatedly offered the property punctuation of hills to make it conforms.

amendments to correct punctuation of bills to make it conform to amendments newly offered or newly adopted; he denied that proposition and said he never had offered such an amendment and that he never expected to do so. Here is what took place. I quote from the Congressional Record of April 20, 1912, page

Mr. Fowler. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the period after the word "dollars," in line 15, page 18, and insert a colon in lieu the word "dollars," in line 10, page 10, and insert to thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Page 18, line 15, strike out the period after the word "dollars" and insert a colon in lieu thereof."

Mr. Mann. Mr. Chairman, I do not oppose the amendment, but I may say it never has been considered necessary to make an amendment of that kind. It is the duty of the engrossing clerk to properly punctuate the bill when amendments are offered.

Mr. Fowler. Mr. Chairman, that may have been the custom in this House, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] has repeatedly offered such amendments on the floor of this House when amendments have been made to a bill.

Mr. Mann. Well, I beg my colleague's pardon.

Mr. Fowler. Whether the gentleman desires to be technical on my amendment I do not know, but I want to say to him and to this committee it has been the custom in my short stay here that wherever there is an amendment destroying the punctuation it is in order to offer an amendment correcting the punctuation to give it the right intelligence. [Applause.]

Mr. Mann, Mr. Chairman, the amendment is undoubtedly in order. I have never offered such an amendment during my service in the House, and never expect to do it, because an engrossing clerk who knows enough to write would know enough to make the correction, and that is his duty, that is part of the engrossment of the bill.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

In order, Mr. Chairman, that there may be no mistake with reference to the gentleman's conduct in the past regarding this character of amendments, I desire to call the attention of the House to page 1496 of the Congressional Record of this session of Congress, January 29, 1912. On that page my colleague from Illinois [Mr. Mann] offered five amendments, which read as follows:

as follows:

Mr. Mann. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Chairman. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amend, page 22, line 14, after the word 'parts,' by striking out the period and inserting the following: 'From a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which imposes no import ax or duty upon the importation from the United States of cottonseed oil, cottolene, and cotton stearin, and lard and compounds thereof."

The Chairman. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. Mann. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 81.

Mr. Mann. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. Austin and Mr. Dixon of Indiana.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Mann. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amend, page 22, line 14, after the word 'parts,' by striking out the period and inserting the following: 'From a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which imposes no tax or duy or restriction, by way of regulation or otherwise, upon the importation from the United States of live cattle, meats of all kinds, fresh, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, canned, or prepared or preserved in any manner.'"

The Chairman. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann].

or restriction, by way of regulation or otherwise, upon the importation from the United States of live cattle, meats of all kinds, fresh, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, canned, or prepared or preserved in any manner."

The Chaiman. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. Mann. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 83.

Mr. Mann. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. Austin and Mr. Underwood.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 89.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Mann. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Chairman. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amend, page 22. line 14, after the word 'parts,' by striking out the period and inserting the following: 'From a country, dependency, province, or colony, being the product thereof, which does not impose any export tax or charge of any kind upon or in any way restrict the exportation to the United States of crude potash or black salts, crude or refined carbonate of potash, hydrate of or caustic potash, or muriate of potash."

The Chaimman. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of fered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. Mann. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 88.

Mr. Mann. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. Austin and Mr. Hull.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 88.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Mann. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the C committee again divided; and the tellers reported-ayes 50, Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Mann. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment to the paragraph.

The Chairman. The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows;

"Amend, page 22, line 14, after the word 'parts,' by striking out the period and inserting the following: 'From a country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government, being the product thereof, which does not impose any export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever upon or which does not prohibit or restrict in any way the exportation of news-print paper, wood pulp, or pulp wood."

The question being taken on the amendment, on a division (demanded by Mr. Mann) there were—ayes 42, noes 61.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Chairman I would not have adverted to this matter in

Mr. Chairman, I would not have adverted to this matter in anywise whatever, but my colleague in the past has repeatedly stood here on the floor of this Chamber and, in language which was not, in my opinion, respectful to other Members of this House, criticized the honest efforts of these gentlemen while discharging their duties to the people of this country. I have the highest respect for the membership of this House, and I expect to hold my bearings in this respect as long as I remain here. But, Mr. Chairman, when Members of the House in their rightful attitude are discharging their duties in this legislative Hall they have a right to expect of every other Member of this House that degree of courtesy and good faith which is required by the rules of this House and which is demanded by the dignity of this body.

Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman was trying to make it appear that such legislation was too small to be considered by the House I called his attention to the fact that he had attempted such legislation in the past. He denied it, and said it was not true. While, as a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, the quotation from the Congressional Record shows that he did do so, five times in quick succession one day while we were

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, punctuation is one of the most important features of a law. Its meaning is reflected by the punctuation, and without the proper punctuation the true intent of a legislative body can not be deciphered. It is often difficult to interpret the meaning of laws with the aid of proper punctuation. The gentleman is wrong when he says that it is the duty of the enrolling and engrossing clerk to punctuate the bill after its passage. This would confer legislative power on him, and his punctuation might give an entirely different mean-ing to that intended by the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, not only has he in the past undertaken to correct legislation by correcting the punctuation in the in-stances which I have referred to, but he did it during the last session of Congress more than once. Now, I do not know whether the gentleman is getting old and childish [laughter] or whether he is intending to try to make every Member on the floor who does not agree with him feel miserable by his insulting language.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.
Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman please state the proposition more explicitly?

Mr. FOWLER. The question raised deals with the propriety of amending the punctuation of bills. I presume the gentleman was out while I have been discussing the matter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, with these few remarks upon this question, that if I have said anything that is offensive to any gentleman on the floor of this House at any time I desire now to withdraw that statement and beg his pardon-with the exception of my statements in reference to the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague [Mr. MANN]. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Under the special rule of the House—
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MONDELL. To ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have two minutes myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mon-DELL] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Illinois for five minutes?

Mr. MANN. No; only two minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the other day a gentleman offered an amend-ment to come in after the word "dollars" at some place in the bill, as I recall it. The amendment was inserted after the word "dollars," as reported by the Clerk, and it commenced with the word "provided." The amendment was not even offered to come in after the period, although if it had been it would not that the only person who will take the office lives 5 miles have been necessary to offer an amendment to change the punctuation.

So far from never having offered an amendment on the floor of the House to change punctuation, I have frequently offered such amendments, but if anybody has ever found that I have offered an amendment after the committee has inserted an amendment following the last word of a paragraph to strike out the period and insert some other punctuation, then I will think that I was in that condition of mind which my colleague [Mr. Fowler] thinks I am in, and which I fear he is in, growing somewhat aged and decrepit in spirit.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman— Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to proceed with the general debate provided under the rules of the House. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon | moves that the debate on this paragraph be now closed, and that the committee proceed with the general debate. The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the special rule adopted by the House, and by unanimous-consent agreement, general debate will now begin, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] and the other half by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Gardner].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think I asked and received unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Mr. MOON of Tennessec. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that if he did, I did not understand it, and I will yield to him five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be a little difficult to get even five minutes on the floor of the House to discuss the question of star routes.

There was a time when a great many men in the House were interested in star routes, but since the rural free delivery has taken the place of the star route in most of the congressional districts the star-route carrier is overlooked and forgotten.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] is worried because a rural carrier has to carry a few pounds more than some other rural carrier, but no one seems to be distressed because a star-route carrier carries on an average three or four times as much mail as a rural carrier, and no one seems to appreciate the fact that he receives much less compensation for his labor.

The average cost of carrying a star route is about 8 cents a mile. The average cost of a rural route is approximately 12 cents a mile, and there is an amendment now pending whereby the compensation is to be increased.

The star-route carrier performs the same service that the rural carrier does. On many star routes he delivers, in the same number of miles, packages to nearly as many boxes. He generally travels a country very much more difficult, over much poorer roads than those traveled by the rural carriers. Yet we have not passed a Post Office appropriation bill for years that has carried an adequate appropriation for star routes. I do not think this bill carries an adequate appropriation for that purpose.

In the bill last year I succeeded in securing an additional appropriation of $40,000. The bill went to the Senate and the department asked for $60,000 more, and still the appropriation was deficient. I have not proposed an amendment at this time because of the fact that the department insists that the amount carried in the bill is sufficient. I think it will develop that it is insufficient.

As time passes, and as the rural routes displace the star routes, it becomes more and more difficult to get fair and decent pay for a star-route carrier. It becomes more and more difficult to secure the establishment of star routes. It is the one part of our postal service that has been going down hill and getting worse, while every other part of it has been improving for years past.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it the contention of the gentleman from Wyoming that as we reduce the number of star routes we reduce the appropriation out of proportion to the decreased number of routes?

That has been true for quite a number of Mr. MONDELL. years past. The department constantly estimates a reduction of star routes in excess of the number of star routes or the mileage that is actually dispensed with. The result is that when we try to secure additional star routes we are met with the statement that the appropriation is insufficient. When we try to get an extension of a star route the appropriation is insufficient.

beyond the former post office. Yet the department says they have not money enough to extend this absolutely necessary There are many gentlemen in the House who are very much interested in the rural routes, and the consequence is that the rural-route appropriation increases all the time. The men interested in the star routes are few in number, and so the poor star-route carrier gets what he can. If he has a mountain route, such as many in our State, where the snows are deep in winter and where the read is difficult at all times, he must bid a sum low enough to satisfy the department. not matter how much it may actually cost to carry the route. The department will pay only what they consider a fair price.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is in control of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK, Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make a statement to the committee before any more time is yielded. Under the rule there is a provision that 15 hours of general debate shall be devoted to the subject of the parcel post and parcel express, and five hours of general debate to the other subject included in the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that is the provision of the rule, but under a unanimous-consent agreement, made in the House the other day by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon], which was finally agreed to, it was agreed that the 20 hours of general debate should run along and Members might speak upon any one of the subjects at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then act upon the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the purpose was to have an unbroken debate, and that gentlemen might speak on any section they saw fit.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I was observing that without regard to the difficulty of the routes the department fixes an arbitrary sum, above which it will not let a contract. result is that some of the very worst star routes in the country, routes that have to be carried on snowshoes in the winter, are being carried for 9 and 10 cents a mile, or 2 and 3 cents a mile less than we pay to the rural carrier; but the star-route carrier has not hundreds of Members occupying seats here to speak for him, and so the department enforces its arbitrary rule, with a view of keeping down the expense of carrying the mail in the new and undeveloped portions of the country.

I cherish the hope that the department, inasmuch as they insist this appropriation is all they need, will be a little more liberal in regard to these routes in the future. There are some of them that are exceedingly difficult. None of them are routes easily carried, and it does seem to me that the department is parsimonious to an extent that can not be justified when it beats down the contract price under which the Government is served below the price it pays to the man it employs to perform the service as a rural carrier. It is certainly as expensive and difficult to carry these routes as it is to carry the rural routes, and at least as much should be paid for them.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I favor the amendment which will be offered to the pending bill providing for Federal aid to roads by way of compensation for their use in carrying the mails. Members are familiar with the amendment and I will not read it, but will ask to insert it in my remarks.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

The amendment referred to is as follows:

That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States and the civil subdivisions thereof are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be sieeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide, of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface, by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State or civil subdivision thereof which falls within Classes A, B, or C for the purpose of transporting rural mall, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of Class A, $20 per annum per mile for highways of Class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall bay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within Classes A, B, or C. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913. of July, 1913.

It embodies all of the provisions of a bill which I introduced in the House on the 8th day of April, 1912, with the single exception that the rate of compensation to be paid by the Government for the use of post roads in carrying the mails has been No constitutional objection can be offered to the amendment, because Congress is expressly authorized by section 8, article 1, of the Constitution to establish post offices and post roads, and the power to establish necessarily carries with it the power to maintain or to pay for the maintenance and use of same when already established. The Democratic Party is com-mitted to the policy of Federal aid in the construction and maintenance of post roads, for in the national platform adopted at Denver in 1908 it declared:

We favor Federal aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

The amendment is therefore not only a wise, economic measure, promoting, as it will, the general welfare and progress of the entire Nation, but it is also Democratic and exactly in line with the promise made to the people by the party in the platform upon which a Democratic House was elected in 1910.

REASONS WHY AMENDMENT SHOULD BE ADOPTED.

There are several reasons why I favor this amendment and this form of Federal aid to this great work of internal improvement.

First. It is just and proper that the farmers and citizens, whose money, in the form of taxes, and whose labor build the roads of the country, should receive some compensation from the Government for their use in carrying the mails, more especially since the money so paid will be used in further improving and maintaining the roads. The Government pays more than $50,000,000 every year to the railroad companies for the use of their roads in hauling the mails, and this money goes to swell the receipts and increase the dividends of the stockholders, whose capital built and maintains our great and necessary railway systems. Why, then, should not our Government pay something for the use of our post roads to the citizens who have been taxed to build them, and who are to that extent stockholders, although they receive no dividends or money profit therefrom? The money so paid will not go into the pocket of any individual or set of individuals, but will be used toward the further improvement of our highways and in maintaining those already built.

Second. The enactment of this amendment will prove a great incentive to good road building throughout the country. Every State and locality will be anxious to improve their roads, so as to receive the greatest rate of compensation allowed. It is not open to the objection, with which I do not agree, but which has been made by some to the appropriation of a lump sum to each State to be used in road building on the ground that in some localities it might bring about a disposition to wait and let our National Government furnish all the money necessary to build post roads,

Third. This amendment safeguards the rights of the States, and neither warrants nor permits Federal interference in our local affairs. Each State or locality is left free to build its roads in its own way, locating them where it pleases and improving them in such a manner as it may see fit.

These, Mr. Chairman, are some of the reasons which actuated me in introducing the bill to which I have referred, after a conference held by many Members for the purpose of devising some feasible and proper legislation on the subject, and which prompt me to lend my support to the amendment now pending.

There are only 12 States of the entire 48 States in the Union which have a greater number of rural routes than the State of Tennessee, and 4 of those States exceed Tennessee by a very small number. During the years intervening between 1904 and 1909 there was a great deal of road building, more activity being shown than during any previous years. Statistics show that Tennessee stood eighth in the list of all the States in percentage and number of miles of roads improved during those years. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not advocate the adoption of this amendment because I believe that the State which I have the honor to represent in part will receive a considerable portion of the money which will be paid for the use of post roads if it is enacted into law. I am not moved by any such narrow reason in my advocacy of it. I place it upon the broad principle of right and justice. It is because I believe that there is nothing which will do more for the upbuilding and the general prosperity of the whole country than a complete and perfect system History shows that no country has ever sucof good roads. ceeded in building up a great system of highways without the benefit of national aid, and I believe that our National Government should render some assistance along that line without in any way attempting to interfere with the rights of the States. This amendment is thoroughly safeguarded in that respect, and I believe that it has a better chance of passage than any other measure which has been proposed. If our Government shall become committed to the policy and later on a better and more feasible plan is proposed, then it can be changed. But I feel confident that the passage of this amendment will bring splendid results and will prove satisfactory to the people of the entire country.

IMPORTANCE OF GOOD ROADS TO NATION.

If our Nation is to reach its highest productive capacity and fully develop all of its material resources, then we must have The success of a nation depends not so much upon good roads. what it makes as upon what it produces from the soil. Anything, therefore, which will have the result of economizing in the cost of transporting the products of the farm to the town must redound to the general welfare of the entire population. The soil is the real source of all wealth. The farmer feeds the Hence, whatever will enable him to get his produce easily, quickly, and cheaply to market contributes most materially to the comfort, happiness, and the prosperity of all the Good roads promote the success of the church and the better development of our schools; they result in a cheaper and quicker mail delivery, thereby adding to the advantage of intelligent and social intercourse among the people. They will have a tendency to cheapen food products and also the products of the manufacturer. They add to the attractiveness as well as to the profit of farm life, and will do much toward relieving the congestion in our badly crowded cities. In short, good roads mean better homes, better churches, better schools, and increased advantages in all of those things which add to our national growth and prosperity.

I can not, Mr. Chairman, in what I shall say, hope to add anything to what has already been said concerning this subject and the advantages to be derived from good roads, but I beg the indulgence of the House while I briefly refer to some of the reasons why the Government should extend its aid, because I do not believe they can be emphasized too much.

POLICY OF GOVERNMENT RELATIVE TO INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

This Government years ago adopted the wise policy of improving our waterways in the interest of our commerce, and this policy has redounded to the welfare of the Nation by lessening freight rates and affording cheaper transportation. is it not equally as wise to lend some assistance toward the improvement of our land highways in order that the products of the farm may have cheaper transportation to the towns and shipping points and that the products of the factory may more cheaply reach the farm? Years ago, at the beginning of the era of railroad building, subsidies of lands and loans of money were freely granted by the Government to the western railroads to aid in cheapening transportation across the western plains. If I mistake not, about 200,000,000 acres of public lands were at various times granted as subsidies to various I do not for one moment indorse those enormous railroads. grants of public property, but the point is that if this Government has, in the interest of cheaper transportation, done so much in the past for railroad companies, then surely there can be no reason why our Government should not assist in cheapening transportation on our highways when it is wholly for the public weal. Our Government is spending more than $225,000,000 every year upon our Army and Navy. I am in favor of maintaining an adequate Army and Navy, one suffi-ciently large to defend our coasts and protect the Nation's honor and the rights and property of her citizens, but I do not agree with those who wish to make this Nation the most powerful fighting nation on earth. There are those who advocate the building of two battleships, rather than one, every year at a cost of from fourteen to fifteen millions of dollars each. I recognize the necessity of maintaining our Navy up to a reasonable and proper standard, but for my part I do not want to see our roads and the internal improvement of our country neglected in order that these already great expenditures may be unnecessarily increased. It is, of course, necessary to add to our Navy from time to time, but battleships in a few years become obsolete and out of date and are thrown aside for those more modern, more expensive, and more to be dreaded. But good roads are never abandoned. No one wants to destroy them, for they do not aggrevate; they please. They add to the wealth of the Nation; and, after all, Mr. Chairman, the power and stability They add to the wealth of the of a nation depends primarily upon its commercial importance and the happiness and prosperity of her citizenship rather than upon the number of its battleships or the size of its Army. plause.] We spent last year more than $152,000,000 in pensions, notwithstanding the Civil War ended nearly 50 years ago; and I regret to say that there is some likelihood that before the present session ends additional legislation will be enacted which will increase this already unjustifiably large amount so that for some years to come our pension roll will amount each year to nearly, if not quite, $200,000,000 per annum. This money neither builds up the country nor does it promote its general welfare.

It is but just and proper, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment should be passed in the interest of the farmers, who contribute possibly 60 per cent of these and the other expenses of our Government and who, as a class, have up to this time received so little of the benefits of legislation. Especially is this true since it will not only help the farmer individually, but will increase the wealth of the entire country.

LOSS ON ACCOUNT OF BAD SYSTEM OF ROADS.

Better roads enable a farmer to draw bigger loads with less injury to his team and wagon. For that reason he will, of course, derive a greater profit for his year's work. No one can estimate how much the farmers of this country lose annually on account of a bad system of roads. Our internal commerce is greater than the interforeign commerce of the world. per cent of it has to be hauled over highways, and it is estimated that the average haul is 9.4 miles and that the average cost of hauling is 23 cents per ton per mile. While it may be less in some localities, this estimate gives a general idea as to the cost of transportation over country roads. In France the average cost per ton per mile is only about 7 cents, while in England and Germany it is about 11 cents. This great difference in cost is due to the superiority of the roads of those countries over the roads in this country. If all of our roads were as good as those of the countries named, it is estimated that the average cost of hauling would be reduced from 23 cents to 12 or 13 cents per ton per mile. More than 300,000,000 tons are hauled annually over our roads, and their improvement would thus result in saving annually from $250,000,000 to $400,000,000 to our agricultural interests. The sums so saved would be sufficient in a few years to pike every mile of public roads in this country. Who will say that this difference is not the direct result of the fact that those countries have for years given national aid toward the building of the highways? France began this work under the great Napoleon, and whatever may have been the ruin and havoc he brought upon the countries of Europe, not even excepting his own, it will stand as a lasting monument to his genius and statesmanship.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers of the country are paying, either in their own labor and that of their teams or in the labor of others, this enormous cost to market their produce. no argument to show that this cost would be reduced by a better system of roads. Experience shows that the improvements in roadbeds and rolling stock have served to steadily decrease railroad rates, and for the same reason the cost of wagon transportation would be decreased by an improvement of our highways. It is a significant fact that while the cost of transportation by railroad and water is now, on an average, less than oneninth of what it was years ago, the cost of transportation over our roads has increased, according to statistics, 35 per cent. It costs 1.6 cents more to haul a bushel of wheat 9.4 miles than it does to carry it from New York to Liverpool, a distance of about 3,100 miles. Thus it is that a system of bad roads proves an impediment to the farmer, preventing him from getting to market in an easy, quick, and cheap manner and costing him an untold sum in time, labor, and money. To all of this must be added the loss to the wealth of the country occasioned by the failure of the farmer to produce as large crops as he otherwise would produce if the roads were better and his market more easy of access, not to mention the value of the products. which he is compelled to allow to go to waste because of the expense of hauling to market.

INCREASE TO WEALTH OF COUNTRY,

Then, too, Mr. Chairman, an improved system of roads materially increases the value of farm lands. It is said that this increase in value ranges from two to nine dollars per acre. When it is remembered that there are about 450,000,000 acres of land in cultivation in the United States it resolves itself into a matter of simple arithmetic to figure the enormous increase of wealth which would be brought to the farmers of this country by a complete system of good roads. There are about 850, 000,000 acres of improved and unimproved lands in the United States. Much of this is at present inaccessible and would prove unprofitable for cultivation on account of the difficulty of hauling the produce to market. The Agricultural Department figures that there are about 400,000,000 acres of land in the United States which are uncultivated. Think of the enormous addition to the wealth and the prosperity of this Nation if we had a system of reads which would need this land. a system of roads which would reach this land and open it up for cultivation. How many families who are now living in the congested quarters of some of our large cities, frequently among unhealthy surroundings and eking out a bare subsistence, would be furnished with comfortable and happy homes. One of the most unfortunate conditions of the present day is the growing tendency to leave the farm and crowd into the cities. will do more to stop this than a system of good roads, which will not only make farm life more remunerative, but even more attractive than it now is by bringing neighbors closer together, thereby facilitating social intercourse and bringing the farmer nearer to the church and the school.

During the decade between 1890 and 1900 the population of the towns increased 46 per cent as compared with 40 per cent in the decade before and 3.4 per cent in 1790. Twenty-five counties with only 5 per cent of improved roads, selected at random by the office of the director of roads, lost 3,112 each in population, while 25 other counties, with 40 per cent of improved roads and selected in the same manner, gained 31,095 to the county population. These figures show the present tendency of the country to lose in population to the towns, and, in my judgment, they also point to one way in which it can be checked.

GOOD ROADS PROMOTE EDUCATIONAL PROGRESS.

I have said that good roads will result in better schools and churches. Children can not regularly attend schools in the country over bad roads in certain seasons of the year, nor can people attend their churches. Statistics show that in States with 34 per cent of improved roads an average of 77 out of 100 enrolled pupils regularly attend school. The same investigation shows that in States with only 12 per cent of improved roads only 59 out of 100 enrolled pupils attend school with any degree of regularity. No stronger evidence showing the advantageous effect of good roads on the education of the boys and girls of the country could possibly be presented.

INCREASED COMPETITION IN FARMING.

Mr. Chairman, there is another controlling reason why the Government should lend some assistance in building good roads. The time has come when the farmers of this country must give attention to the competition of the farmers of Canada, South America, and of Africa. In the last few years great areas of land in these countries adapted in a large measure to the growing of nearly every crop that can be grown in the United States have been opened up. The soil is most fertile and will produce as much, and, in certain kinds of crops, more than the soil of the United States. The time has come when our farmers must meet the progressive farmers of those countries in competition for the markets of the world. Certainly this Government owes it to the farmer, who is the foundation source of all of its abundant wealth and great power, to give to him every assistance possible in meeting this competition. In what more effective way can this be done than by building good roads and thus lessening the cost of the transportation of his products from the farm to the market? We have seen how the farmers of this country lose hundreds of millions of dollars every year in money, time, and labor on account of bad roads. This does not include damage to teams and wagons, which can not be estimated. Nor does it include what could be carned during the extra time consumed in hauling by reason of a bad condition of roads.

For years the Republican Party has committed this Government to the unfair and unjust policy of protecting the large manufacturer, notwithstanding the fact that it has been done at the expense of the people, and in spite of the fact that such a policy has served to build up great trusts and combinations which grind out enormous profits every year at the expense of more than 92,000,000 people. But the proposition now pending involves no such principle. The farmer does not and never has asked for protection. He only asks for justice and the right to participate to some little extent in some of the benefits of a always been patient even under circumstances which would have justified a protest. But the time has come when Representatives should do something for his welfare. The passage of this amendment will not benefit him alone. It will benefit all classes of people, for, as I have said, the soil is the real source Whenever the farmer prospers the country of our wealth. prospers, and whenever conditions are adverse with him then the country suffers. His products have caused the balance of trade with foreign countries to be in our favor and have helped to make this country great and powerful. Legislation which will enable him to increase his product and his profits will not only serve to cheapen the cost of living but it will add to our balance of trade and increase the general prosperity of the entire country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL] five minutes.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, the present Post Office appropriation bill contains two provisions in particular in which I am deeply interested. One is the provision which reestablishes the eght-hour working day for letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices; the other is the provision by which appropriation is made for the promotion of 75 per cent of the letter carriers in first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, and for the promotion of 75 per cent of the letter carriers in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade. These proposals are so reasonable, so necessary, and so just that this House ought not for a moment to hesitate to adopt them. The first of these provisions which I mention is embodied in section 5 of the pending bill and reads .

That on and after July 1 next, following the passage of this act, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices shall be required to work not more than 8 hours a day: Provided, That the 8 hours of service shall not extend over a longer period than 10 consecutive hours, and the schedules of duty of the employees shall be regulated accordingly.

That in cases of emergency, or if the needs of the service require, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices can be required to work in excess of eight hours a day, and for such additional services they shall be paid extra in proportion to their salaries as fixed by law.

The plain and simple purpose of this section is to extend to the carriers and clerks affected by it the benefit of an eighthour law, and thus to place them, so far as fair treatment is concerned, on an equal footing with all other Government employees.

Congress has repeatedly expressed its belief in the wisdom and the efficacy of an eight-hour working day. It has confirmed this belief by frequent legislation on the subject. It has established the eight-hour period as the limit of daily labor in every other department of the Government. To-day it prohibits contractors who perform work for the Government from requiring their employees to render more than eight hours' daily Notwithstanding, however, this stringency of labor regulations over other departments of the Government and in regard to independent contractors engaged in Government work, there is no statute of this kind to protect the post-office em-They can be required to serve as many hours per day as their superiors may see fit to order. They can be compelled, and are now actually compelled, to work 10 and 12 hours a day and in some cases even more.

Will the gentleman yield? Certainly. Mr. CALDER.

Mr. HAMILL.

Mr. CALDER. Sometimes these clerks are compelled to work 16 hours a day.

Mr. HAMILL. I thank the gentleman from New York for his valuable information. It is certainly unjust to work men such a length of time continuously.

And yet some years ago the letter carriers did enjoy the benefit of an eight-hour law. They lost the advantage of it, however, through a species of legislative chicane, and have never since recovered it. The means through which they acquired this benefit and the way by which they were deprived of it is worth while remarking.

The legislation on the subject dates back to 1888. the session of that year, on May 24, Congress passed the measure known as the letter carriers' eight-hour law. This statute, Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large, page 157, specifically limited the hours of labor of letter carriers to not more than eight hours each day. Notwithstanding, however, the positive mandate of the law, the post-office officials disregarded its requirement, and for seven successive years from the date of its passage it stood as a dead letter upon the statute books.

Finally, to discover what validity and effect this legislation possessed, the case known as United States v. Post (148 U. S., 124) was instituted and carried at length to the Supreme Court government to which he is the greatest contributor. He has of the United States. It was a case where a letter carrier sued for compensation for labor performed in excess of the eight hour daily period, and the purpose of the action was to test the soundness of a great number of similar claims. The Supreme Court decided in favor of the carrier, and as a result of their determination commissioners were appointed by the Court of Claims to adjust the matter, and they awarded the sum of $3,000,000, which was distributed among letter carriers throughout the country in payment for overtime service.

It was not, however, until January 1, 1895, that the letter carriers came into the full enjoyment of the benefits of the eight-hour law enacted in 1888. This was brought about through the action of Postmaster General Bissell, who, recognizing the controlling weight of the Supreme Court decision, and in order to cut off future claims for overtime service, issued an order whereby postmasters and supervisory employees were required to so arrange the routes and schedules of their offices that the carriers therein would not be required to work over eight hours a day. For about five and a half years the mandate of this statute was obeyed with strict fidelity, and its observance tended greatly to promote satisfaction and comfort among the carriers. But the law was abolished in 1900 through the effect of a clause which was inserted in the bill passed that year making appropriations for the Post Office Department. While this bill was under debate in this House on April 24, 1900, the then chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads offered from the floor and had carried an amendment contained in these words:

Provided, That letter carriers may be required to work as nearly as practicable only 8 hours on each working day, but not in any event exceeding 48 hours during the 6 working days of each week, and such number of hours on Sunday, not exceeding 8, as may be required by the needs of the service; and if a legal holiday shall occur on any working day the service performed on said day, if less than 8 hours, shall be counted as 8 hours without regard to the time actually employed.

This 48-hour law, as it was called, went into effect June 30, 1900. The operation of it caused general discontent both among those amenable to it and those who honestly attempted to enforce it. Various interpretations and constructions were placed upon the law, with the result that the carriers never knew Just what would be the daily hours of duty they would be required to serve. But it was believed, nevertheless, that however obnoxious the act might be the operation of it would expire on June 30, 1901, the date to which the appropriation bill into which it had been put made provision for the expenditures of the Post Office Department. This was the opinion on it which was given by the Assistant United States Attorney General attached to the Post Office Department; and pursuant, therefore, to this advice a return was made on July 1, 1901, to the 8-hour law of 1888 on the supposition that the so-called 48-hour law bad become null and void through time limitation.

But this opinion, however gratifying, was not subsequently sustained by the Court of Claims. On the contrary, it was directly reversed some years afterwards. A case was submitted to this tribunal where a letter carrier claimed payment for overtime. He had not worked more than 48 hours during a certain week, but on various days of that week had worked more than 8 hours, and the Postmaster General requested to be informed whether or not the claim of the carrier was valid. The Court of Claims decided in the negative and held that the carrier was not entitled to extra compensation, for the reason that the act of May 24, 1888, known as the 8-hour law, had been superseded by the subsequent act of June 2, 1900, known as the 48-hour law, and that this latter statute still existed in all its original force and vigor.

Thus, the letter carriers were again compelled to work under a law which no one desired and which had been intended merely as an experiment. More than this, it was a law which prescribed no penalty for its violation, and, as a consequence, they could not, under the ruling of the United States Supreme Court, sustain an action in case it were disregarded. They could neither compel their superiors to adhere to it nor could they obtain extra compensation if forced to work for a longer period than the weekly 48 hours. And, according to reports, the law was in many cases flagrantly disregarded.

The result of this situation need not be outlined further than to state that the employees keenly felt the injustice and imposition of the law and that the Post Office service and the public generally suffered continual damage from its enforcement.

In the light of these facts there can be no possible question

In the light of these facts there can be no possible question of the expediency and the justice of adopting the recommendation of this bill restoring the original eight-hour law and giving carriers and clerks the benefits conferred by it. In private industrial enterprises eight hours is now universally recognized to be as many as a man of average strength and health can give daily to his work with justice both to himself and to his employer. Surely we expect the United States Government to be at least as fair as the private employer, especially when both the Government and the public will be the gainers and beneficiaries from the pursuit of such a course ciaries from the pursuit of such a course.

In closing my remarks on this subject I wish to pay my compliments to my colleague from Connecticut, Mr. Rehly, the author of this eight-hour measure. From the time when he introduced it until now he has advocated it with persistency and fervor, and I feel sure that his efforts to have it made a law will be crowned with deserved success.

Closely connected with the eight-hour law as a means to effect an improvement in the condition of the postal employees is the second provision I have mentioned—that which appropriates a sufficient sum of money to enable postmasters in first and second class post offices to promote to the highest compensated grades in the service those employees whose proved efficiency entitles them to the advancement.

The inability of postmasters to do this at present is owing to the parsimonious action of Congress at the session after the law was passed which divided employees in first and second class was passed which divided employed.

post offices into different grades.

By a law enacted in the Fifty-ninth Congress, approved March 2, 1907, the postal clerks in offices of the first and second class and the carriers in the City Delivery Service were divided, according to salary, into six grades. The first grade received an annual compensation of $600; the second grade, $800; the third grade, $900; the fourth grade, $1,000; the fifth grade, $1,100; and the sixth and highest grade, $1,200. It was further provided that the clerks and carriers in first-class offices should be promoted successively to the fifth grade and that the clerks and carriers in second-class offices should be promoted successively to the fourth grade, but no promotion was permitted to be made except upon evidence satisfactory to the Post Office Department of the efficiency and the fidelity of the employee. Besides this, it permitted the making of a reduction in grade and salary. This could be done by a postmaster whenever, in his judgment, the clerk or carrier had failed to maintain the standard of efficiency proper to the grade in which he belonged.

This requirement put every man on his mettle and made industry and merit the ground and test for promotion. To provide for the proper enforcement of the law efficiency records were established. The character and conduct of every employee was carefully examined and the results of the investigations systematically tabulated. In this way a very high degree of efficiency was kept up, in consequence of which the Government received full and ample service for every dollar expended in salary. Now, as I have stated, the Fifty-ninth Congress created six grades or classifications. But the difficulty was it did not allow an employee after a certain number of years of service and demonstrated fitness to be advanced automatically to the highest grade. In first-class offices clerks and carriers could successively advance only to the fifth grade, where further promotions ceased, while in second-class offices clerks and carriers could advance only to the fourth grade, at which stage their right to further promotion terminated. To remedy this defect right to further promotion terminated. the Sixtieth Congress enacted a statute directing promotion to the highest grade in the service of all clerks and carriers in first and second class post offices whose records justified advancement.

It would seem impossible that any serious objection could be made against such a measure, and yet, curiously enough, during the debate upon it in Congress the law encountered opposition on the ground that the appropriation for this purpose would be improperly expended and that postmasters would use it to reward their own favorites rather than to elevate employees whose records justly gave them the preference. This suspicion on the part of Congress proved afterwards to have been wholly without foundation. The amount appropriated was used with vigorous impartiality and fairness, and only those whose merits recommended them received the benefit of it.

But the suspicion expressed had unfortunately this effect: Congress appropriated only 50 per cent of the amount that was necessary to provide compensation for all whose records warranted their advancement. What was the result? In the first place, dissatisfaction and complaint among employees, and in the second, almost insuperable difficulty and embarrassment to superiors having the right to promote. The employees declared that where two men had equal right for a promotion, which by reason of the failure of the law to provide sufficient funds only one could obtain, the postmaster selected his own favorite. Anyhow, in a number of such instances what did actually happen was that neither obtained advancement. In cases where two employees were equally entitled to promotion postmasters have been known to refrain from recommending either for fear of laying themselves open to the charge of favoritism or injustice. Thus both employees suffered the unjust consequences of an appropriation law which did not adequately cover the situation to which it was intended to apply.

The recommendation which the committee has embodied in this bill appropriates a sufficient sum of money to make possible the promotion of at least 75 per cent of the number of employees estimated as being entitled to advancement. For my part I am constrained to remark that it might and could have been made more liberal. Considering, however, the sums not needed to be disbursed on account of deaths, resignations, and reductions, it is hoped that in default of procuring anything better it will prove adequate for the purpose for which it is designed.

In any event it is a distinct step forward. It affords relief in a matter where in all honesty relief should be granted, and it tends by instilling encouragement among the employees to heighten the efficiency of a great and popular branch of the Government service. There is every good reason why Congress should authorize the expenditure.

For it is to be remembered that the post office is the one agency of the Government with which all the people have close and daily relations. It is the one agency with which all are familiar, and which is useful not merely to a part of our population but to all the people alike. Every citizen expects, as a matter of course, to have his mails promptly delivered and to find the business of the post office always in smooth running order. Only a few, however, appreciate the immense amount of labor and attention to detail the maintaining of the post office in this condition necessitates. There is no opportunity for neglect of duty on the part of employees, while the tests they are required to undergo before obtaining permanent employment makes incompetence a rare occurrence. They are chosen as the result of a rigorous civil-service examination. If successful They are chosen as on the examination they are required for several years, and oftentimes more, to work as substitute employee, at the end of which period they may get regular appointment at the small salary of $50 per month. Annually they may be advanced from grade to grade until in second-class offices they reach the fourth grade and in first-class offices the fifth grade. There, by operation of the law, the right to further advancement comes to an end. During all the time, however, that they are climb-ing, by tollsome performance of duty, from the lowest grade to the highest attainable they are always liable, for the slightest misstep, to be reduced in salary under that section of the law which permits demotion to be made on the score of inefficiency. Under such a system, with all its tests and exactions, only the very best, if not exceptional, men can hope to succeed. At the termination of this grinding career, when their vigor and usefulness become impaired from age and faithful devotion to duty, they are not even retired on pension. On this latter sub-I propose to have something to say later on.

This, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, is the character and record of the employees whose interests appeal to you to-day. sincerely trust the appeal will not be in vain, and that both these provisions will be emphatically indorsed and incorporated as a part of the pending appropriation bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Dyen].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention especially at this time to section 6 of this bill, and while I heartily approve of it, I believe that an improvement can yet be made on that section that would be for the interest and good of the service. This bill is going to give a great deal of valuable relief to the employees and carriers in the Post Office Department, and well it should do so and well is it deserved.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in section 6 an improvement could be made by amending it so as to insert a bill that I introduced in this Congress some time ago. I ask unanimous consent to have this amendment which I offer read and have it pending for consideration at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can have the amendment read for information, but it can not be offered, to be pending, now. Without objection, the amendment may be read for information in the time of the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following is stricken out, to wit, beginning with the word "that," line 3, page 30, section 6, and extending to and including the word "thereof." line 22, same page and section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there shall be appointed by the President of the United States a commission, to consist of three members, who shall receive as compensation $3,000 per annum for a term of four years, and may be reappointed. The said commission shall be known as the commission on salaries and allowances of postal employees.

"The duties of the said commission shall be to pass on all salaries of postal employees who are in the classified service. When any employee is entitled to an increase of salary by reason of time and length of service, it shall be the duty of the Post Office Department to certify the said employee to the said commission for promotion, and if for cause the department deems it advisable that an employee be not promoted there shall be filed with the said commission a full report of the case and all charges against said employee, who shall receive a copy of the same and be allowed 10 days to file a written answer or may appear before the commission in person or by attorney, and after such hearing the commission shall decide the case, and such decision shall be final.

"No postal employee of the classified civil service having reached a certain grade and who receives a certain salary shall be reduced to a lower grade except for cause and after a hearing by the commission on salaries and allowances of postal employees.

"When the Post Office Department believes there is a good and sufficient cause for the reduction of salary of a postal employee who is in the classified civil service, it will file with the commission on salaries and allowances its recommendation, with the reasons thereof, and all charges.

and allowances its recommendation, with the reasons thereof, and an charges.

"And a copy of the same shall be sent to the employee recommended for reduction, who shall be allowed 10 days to file a written answer to the same, or he may appear before the said commission in person or by attorney to present his case, and after such hearing the commission shall decide, and such decision shall be final."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, with the amendment which I offer as a substitute for that which should be stricken out, in my judgment, it would make this an admirable section; that part which begins on line 22, page 30, and provides that membership in any society, association, and so forth, shall not constitute or be cause for a reduction in rank or compensation or for removal of such person or group of persons from said service, is a splendid provision, and it will be of great benefit to the service and make it more efficient and more valuable to the service and make it more efficient and more valuable to the public. I therefore heartily indorse, Mr. Chairman, that section as I would suggest it should be amended, which I believe would make a great improvement. I am also heartily in favor of other improvements that are put forth in this proposed law fixing the hours of service, improving the conditions, and so forth, and I would like to see also a provision inserted in this bill to give to the letter carriers and postal clerks throughout the country the same rights and postal clerks throughout the country the same rights and privileges now enjoyed by other civil-service employees, that of leave of absence for 30 days.

Mr. Chairman, in the city of St. Louis on or about the 1st of July we will open the new post office, the most splendidly equipped building, I believe, in the world for handling the mail. At a dinner on the 17th instant in the city of St. Louis the postmaster of our city delivered an address to the members of the Business Men's League upon post-office workings in the city of St. Louis and upon the postal department in general. He has given much time and much thought to the study and to the workings of the postal departments in all parts of this country. He has been upon commissions under the Postmaster General for studying matters pertaining to the pneumatic-tube service and the handling and distribution of the mail. I therefore ask unanimous consent to publish the address of Mr. T. J. Akins, postmaster of that city, delivered on the 17th of April, in the city of St. Louis, as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to print as a part of his remarks the matter indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears

The address is as follows:

SPEECH OF T. J. AKINS, POSTMASTER AT ST. LOUIS, Mo., APRIL 17, 1912.

"Members of the Business Men's League, I am indebted to the efficient secretary of the Business Men's League for the very great pleasure as well as the distinguished honor of speaking briefly at this time.

"Indeed, it is a great honor to speak to a body of men who are the prophets of progress and the architects who are drawing the plans for the greater St. Louis.

To each and every one of us there is a bright spot, kissed by the genial rays of heaven's sun and watered with the dews of progress, the fairest and best portion of the earth—St. Louis.
"Our city stands like a beautiful queen whose crown is beauty, whose creed is hospitality, and whose watchword is progress, whose dominion is the richest valley in the world.

"To extend the trade relations of this splendid city-to increase her influence and make her a power among the great cities of the country-is the work committed to our hands

"In this great work the St. Louis post office is willing to do its full share. We can not draw plans upon the world's trestle board for the extension of our trade relations. We can not send men into unexplored territory to sell your wares, but through one of the best organized postal agencies on the American continent, the St. Louis post office, we can send your messages to every corner of the globe.

We realize that we live in an age of great strenuosity. Everybody is demanding prompt action. The city that makes quick deliveries gets the business.

"In this particular an efficient postal system is of the greatest importance to the business men of St. Louis, and we are straining every nerve to deliver promptly the incoming mail and to dispatch with the least possible delay the outgoing mail.

"In this great work we have had the most beautiful and helpful cooperation from the business men of the city, and as long as I have the honor to be postmaster of this city you will have my best efforts along these lines.

"We look forward with great pleasure to the time when we shall occupy the new post-office building at Eighteenth Street and Clark Avenue. This building is now almost completed, and we confidently expect to occupy the same not later than July 1. When completed in every detail it will be the most modernly equipped building for handling the mails in the entire country, and perhaps in the world.

"Our new automobiles, which are already in operation, will each make 23 trips every 24 hours, covering completely the business section of the city. During the busy portion of each day we expect to make deliveries and collections with our automobiles every 30 minutes. These automobiles are equipped so completely that they will carry from 1,000 to 2,000 pounds of mail with ease and deliver the same on the mailing platform of the new post-office building from our downtown stations in approximately seven minutes.

"This mail will be carried by an automatic conveyor to our new pick-up tables, where it will be properly prepared for dispatch upon the outgoing trains in so short a period that it seems almost incredible.

"If we are fortunate enough to secure additional pneumatictube service the St. Louis post office will then be one of the best-if not the best-equipped offices in the entire country.

THE ORIGIN OF OUR POSTAL SYSTEM.

"Perhaps it might not be uninteresting to you business men to briefly sketch the origin, the development, and the organization of our postal system.

"While each and every one of you recognizes the fact that a postal system in some form has existed for many years, yet few people realize that our postal system is almost as old as organized government.

In your most studious moments if you will walk back along the track of time, guided by the light of history, you will find frequent allusions to the postal system before the Christian era. In the Books of Jeremiah, Esther, and Job frequent allusions are made to the post—'So the post went with letters,' 'So the post passed from city to city.' One sacred writer uses this term to represent the evanescence of human life: 'Swifter than a post my days flee away.'

"According to the great historian, Xenophon, Cyrus the Elder was the first reigning monach that conceived the importance of communicating with various parts of his empire by letters. Hence he built post roads and post houses and appointed trusted couriers or carriers, who received the message from the king and, mounted upon the swiftest horses in his dominion, dispatched these messages with all possible haste to the various parts of his empire. Hence you will see that quick delivery was an essential element in the postal system even in this remote age of the world.

"The postal system of America was first established by a man named Neal and was known as the 'Neal post.' This was operated under a grant from King George. This continued up to the beginning of the Revolutionary War, when Congress, on the 26th day of July, 1775, passed an act creating our postal system and appointed Benjamin Franklin Postmaster General, at a salary of $1,000 per year.

"Within 135 years the American postal system has grown to be the greatest organization in human history. We employ approximately 320,000 people, an army greater than was ever marshaled under one flag, commanded by a single general, on any of the great battle fields of the world. We spend approximately $250,000,000 annually to maintain our postal system.

"Three years ago a deficit of $17,500,000 existed in the Post Office Department, but to-day, I am happy to say, the Post Office Department is self-sustaining and turning into the Government a small surplus.

"We now have 61,000 post offices in operation in the United States and its territories. We have over 26,000 domestic transportation routes aggregating 450,000 miles in length. We have a delivery service by carriers over 41,000 rural routes, delivering mail approximately to 20,000,000 homes daily.

The integrity of the service, while not perfect, is a marvel to all who have studied its operations. Each and every employee in the service, except presidential postmasters and their secretaries, are civil-service employees.

"The integrity of the service is illustrated by the fact that it is estimated by postal experts that only 1 ordinary letter in 100,000 that enter the mail is lost or stolen. It is further estimated that only 1 piece of registered mail in 27,000 pieces that are handled by the post office reaches its destination in bad order, and only 1 piece of registered mail in each 200,000 pieces handled is stolen and never recovered.

"The integrity of the service is further illustrated by the fact that of the 41,000 carriers employed on rural routes, less than 25 were arrested for any offense and removed from the service during the year 1911.

"Two serious defects exist in our postal system for which the Post Office Department is not responsible:

"First, our postal system has grown to be a great business organization, but it is subject to the vicissitudes of political changes. This is a serious handicap. The Postmaster General and the postmasters in great commercial centers, who are efficient, draw their plans to improve the postal system of the country with the same care and caution that would characterize the president and board of directors of a great banking instition, but a change of administration may disconcert all these plans and subject the postal system to radical changes and perhaps place the postal system in unskilled hands, and, as a result, business suffers from the change.

"The other defect lies in the fact that we have no American merchant marine flying the American flag that carries our mails to many countries where our trade relations should be ex-

TRADE FOLLOWS THE MAILS.

"If a St. Louis merchant desires to extend his trade to many South American countries, his goods must go by the way of Liverpool and from there to South America.

It is the purpose of the Postmaster General, upon the completion of the Panama Canal, to make provisions for reaching South America direct, both from the Pacific and the Atlantic Oceans, through the Panama Canal, which will undoubtedly be of wonderful benefit to the commercial interests of the United States. It is a matter of national humiliation that our trade in South America is less than that of Japan.

"In my judgment, one of the demands of the present hour is a merchant marine carrying our mails by the shortest routes to every quarter of the globe.

THE POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

"On January 3, 1911, by authority of an act of Congress, the Post Office Department established postal-savings depositories.

"This system has been rapidly extended until it is now being operated in over 7,000 presidential post offices, and preparations are being made to establish the system in about 40,000 fourthclass offices that do a money-order business.

"The total deposits up to this date are approximately $20,000,000.

"We established a postal-savings depository in the main office in this city on the 1st of August, 1911. We have opened 3,790 accounts. We have received in deposits $320,000. The total value of certificates paid is $106,000, and we have on deposit in the various banks of the city to the credit of the Government $223,627. We have sold in postal-savings bonds $11,320.

"It is estimated that only 5 per cent of the depositors in our postal-savings bank have ever opened a bank account in any of our banking institutions.

"It is the purpose of postal-savings banks to draw money from hiding and place it into the legitimate channels of business; to minimize the sale of international money orders by furnishing safe and remunerative depositories, not only to our own citizens, but to persons of foreign birth as well.

"Great Britain was the pioneer in establishing postal savings banks. This subject was advocated in Great Britain for over 50 years. Finally, in the year 1858, the matter was brought forcibly to the attention of the English Parliament in the shape of a parliamentary resolution.

"This resolution stated that in the year 1857 the sum of £4,000,400 had been lost to depositors in private savings banks through the mismanagement or incompetency of the officials of these institutions. It further recited that the savings banks of Great Britain had gone into the hands of an idle and pleasureloving class, and that out of 638 savings banks in existence nearly 350 of them were open for business only one day each week and then remained open only for a few hours.

"It was further shown that only 20 were open daily for the transaction of business and that 24 towns, each containing 10,000 inhabitants, and 14 counties were without savings institutions of any kind.

"In response to a popular demand, a bill was approved by Mr. Gladstone, chancellor of the exchequer, and Sir Roland Hill, the head of the post-office department of Great Britain, and an act was passed by Parliament on the 17th day of May,

"Since the establishment of postal savings banks of Great Britain the system has extended to practically all of the governments of Europe.

"At the beginning of the year 1910 Great Britain had 11,404,568 depositors in postal savings banks, with a total deposit of over $800,000,000; Italy had 5,000,000 depositors; Japan, 8,000,000 depositors; France, 5,000,000 depositors; and in every country on the globe where this system has been tested by actual experience it has not only proved of inestimable value to the depositors themselves, but to the entire country, including solvent banking institutions.

"The postal savings bank is not the dream of some astute politician sparring for political advantage. It is not a flower that grows in some populistic garden, but it rests upon the conscience and deliberate judgment of the American public, who are perfectly familiar with its operation and success in countries where it has been tested by actual experience.

"It is the purpose of postal savings banks to draw money from hiding in such quantities, and by minimizing the sale of international money orders, that it will make currency famines impossible and panics practically unknown.

POSSIBILITIES OF POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES IN AMERICA.

"America is the most fertile field in the world for the operation of postal savings depositories. While we are the richest Nation in the world, yet we are the most extravagant. This country consumes more than half of the luxuries of the world.

"During the past 15 years the volume of our currency has more than doubled. In 1896 the entire volume of our currency amounted to $1,506,000,000, or $21.48 per capita, of which about 331 per cent was gold.

"The circulating statement of the Treasury Department reveals the fact that at the present time we have $3,464,000,000 in circulation, or about $34.83 per capita, of which about 48 per cent is gold.

"The volume of our currency has grown at the rate of over $120,000,000 annually for the past 15 years, or $10,000,000 per

"The circulating statement issued by the Treasury Department is merely an invoice of the amount and kinds of money issued or coined by the United States Government, but it does not represent the entire stock of money owned by the American people.

"During the period above referred to the trade balances in "During the period above referred pearly $400,000,000 favor of the United States have averaged nearly $400,000,000 annually, or a sum total of $5,500,000,000. This vast sum of money represents the excess of our exports over our imports and, therefore, goes directly into the pockets of the American producer. It can not be taken into account by the circulating statement of the Treasury Department.

"Every carload of wheat sold for export, every pound of beef exported, and every other article sent abroad, in the last analysis represents foreign gold which goes directly to the American producer.

"During the same period of time millions of foreign capital have been invested in American enterprises. Thousands of European farmers have come to our shores, bought land, and invested their private capital in this country.

It is estimated by the most conservative financiers that of all the stock of money owned by the American people more than 50 per cent is in the pockets of the people, or places of hiding, and is not deposited in any bank or trust company of any kind. I emphasize the fact that it is the purpose of postal savings banks to draw millions of money now in hiding and place it into the legitimate channels of circulation.

"The banks of the State of Missouri are well managed and are as solvent institutions as exist on the globe. It is stated in the report of the bank examiner of Missouri that only two or three small failures have occurred within the past two years. and that practically nothing has been lost to the depositors on account of these failures.

'It is a wonderful comment on the integrity of the American financiers that since the establishment of the national banking system in this country less than one-eighth of 1 per cent of all deposits made in national banks has been lost to the depositors. But with this splendid record it is a fact that we have a large number of well-meaning people who have been hoarding their money and fear loss through our banking institutions, but have unlimited confidence in the Government and its guaranty.

"We have 61,000 post offices, covering all centers of population, large and small, in the United States and its Territories. Thousands of them are miles distant from any banking institution of any kind. In our large cities postal savings banks in branch post offices will accommodate the people after banks are closed for the day.

"The value to any country of a system which offers the people a method of systematic saving, and especially encourages the youth to habits of economy, can not be overestimated. The benefits resulting from such a cause are not limited to a monetary consideration, but include improved standards of living, character, and morals. Nothing so greatly encourages economy and thrift as an opportunity to safely deposit small amounts of money with the Government at a small rate of interest.

"I have in mind a boy who was one of our first depositors in the St. Louis office. The amount of his deposit was $2. This deposit has steadily grown from week to week until the balance to his credit to-day is $96.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES WILL INCREASE PATRIOTISM WHERE IT IS MOST NEEDED.

"You will agree with me that history records no instance where a Government by law has ever been destroyed by a frugal people who own their own homes or their business or who have constant and remunerative employment. If a danger exists to this or any other form of constitutional government, it is not from the class of citizenship above mentioned, but from the transient, roving, nomadic classes, whose condition would not be injured in case of revolution or a change of government.

"This class of our citizens consists largely of persons of foreign birth, who come to our shores at the rate of almost 1,000,000 annually, attracted by the scale of wages offered in this country. Many of them can not speak our language. They are unacquainted with the fiber and genius of American Government. They are unacquainted with our splendid public-school system and the opportunities guaranteed to every citizen under our Constitution. They do not know the cost of constitutional liberty. They do not realize the meaning of our flag-that every star represents a State and that each and every State is great, but over and above and beyond them all is one great indivisible union of States, constituting the greatest Republic in the world, and that our flag is the beacon light to every lover of liberty throughout the world.

"To teach the story of patriotism to this mighty multitude is important far beyond our conception. My countrymen, trade expansion is important, but as you carry the story of trade derelopment to the different parts of the globe be also the evangels of a higher and a better patriotism.

"This great multitude of citizens of foreign birth earn their wages, buy foreign money orders, and deposit the same in their native land. As a result of this custom the Post Office Department sells annually over $100,000,000 in foreign money orders. and this vast amount of money must be exported to countries where postal savings banks have been in operation for many years.

"I ask you, practical business men, if it is not a wise policy of government to minimize the sale of international money orders by offering safe and remunerative depositories in our own land?
"I have already alluded to the possibilities of postal savings depositories in this country. If Great Britain, with 40 per cent of our population, has accumulated deposits amounting to over $8,000,000, this forms a basis for estimating the possibilities of the system in this country.

"I make the prediction that by the close of the present calendar year $50,000,000 will be deposited in postal savings depositories in this country, and that the postal savings system will grow from year to year beyond the dream of its most earnest advocate. At the close of the first decade of its operation we will possibly have 10,000,000 depositors with a total deposit of not less than $500,000,000, and by the end of the second decade we will have a sum deposited that will equal our national debt.

BANKS NOT HARMED.

"Postal savings banks will benefit, rather than injure, our solvent banking institutions. There is no instance in history where postal savings banks have been established where they have worked ruin to conservatively managed banks. The bill is so drawn that it permits the redepositing in local banks of not less than 65 per cent of the money gathered in any locality. The board of trustees, which is composed of the Postmaster General, the Attorney General, and Secretary of the Treasury, will accept National, State, municipal, or other bonds having a taxing value as security for said deposit. This will doubtless create an active market for local securities, and the money paid for them will remain in the community where they are purchased.

"As local banks which qualify can receive these deposits by paying the Government 2½ per cent of interest, and as they will draw not less than 4 or 4½ per cent of interest on the bonds deposited with the Government, they will certainly be in a position to accommodate their customers at lower rates of interest than now prevail.

"As I look into the future and see the students of American history carefully studying the achievements of the present century, which, to my mind, are without parallel in the history of nations, I fancy I see them pausing over the record of the year 1910 as marking a new epoch in our national life. It will be pointed to as the beginning of the era when this great Government provided safe and remunerative depositories for its citizens of small means. It will mark the first step taken by a national administration which emphasizes the importance of personal economy among the masses of the people. It will contain the first practical invitation given the people to own and control the bonded debt of the country.

"If it were possible for the present and coming generations to forget every other achievement of the American Congress-of Postmaster General Frank H. Hitchcock and our beloved President, William H. Taft-their name and fame will be made secure for all time to come by having put in operation this form of Government depositories.

"The deposits in postal savings banks will reach such proportions that the country will ultimately be divided into postal savings depository zones. It will doubtless be necessary to provide a local board of directors having intimate knowledge of the value of municipal, county, and State bonds and other securities having a taxing value offered the Government by our banking institutions as security for deposits.

'The bill providing for this form of depositories, while the best within the history of civilization, will doubtless, when tested by actual experience, be found imperfect. It will be amended from time to time as those minor defects become apparent, and make this new policy of government not only permanent, but a blessing to all who use it and a triumph to the genius of American statesmanship."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to send to the Clerk's desk a letter from Mr. George P. House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Sir: We ask your support for the postal express bill now before the House. The farm organizations of the country have indorsed this bill and, after waiting 20 years for Congress to act, are opposed to any halfway measures. The postal express bill provides a real solution and will give the farmers, local merchants, and consumers a satisfactory service, a real parcel post, to which none will object.

Will you kindly favor me with a letter stating your position?

Very truly, yours,

Geo. P. Hampton, Secretary.

GEO. P. HAMPTON, Secretary.

POSTAL EXPRESS NOTES.

The National Grange, at its last annual session, unenimously indorsed the Lewis postal express bill on the favorable reports of both the committee on cooperation and the special committee on postal reform. The following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the National Grange, in forty-fifth annual session assembled, the system of postal express as presented by Congressman Lewis, of Maryland, offered a thorough solution of the parcel-post measures, and that we hereby indorse the same and urge its passage.

parcel-post measures, and that we never indered by every State passage.

This action of the National Grange has been indorsed by every State Grange organization in the country, and the New York State Grange, representing the 100,000 members of that State, passed strong resolutions at the annual session, in February last, calling upon Congress to pass the Lewis bill (Goeke bill) at this session of Congress.

The Pennsylvania State Grange, with 75,000 members, was the first farm organization to indorse the Lewis postal express bill, and is now taking an active lead in the campaign to secure its passage, or rather the passage of the Goeke or Gardner bills, which are essentially the same.

The Maine State Grange, with its 60,000 members, has made the securing of the enactment of the postal express bill its paramount issue. The resolutions adopted are as follows:

Resolved by the Maine State Grange, That we indorse the Gardner bill (S. 5474) and the Goeke bill (H. R. 19133) for a postal express and urge the Patrons of Maine and the farmers of the State generally to bring all possible influence to bear to secure the early enactment of this measure.

The Farmers' Union and the Grange organizations, at their conference last January, organized a joint committee on postal reform composed of an equal number of members from each organization, and this committee was instructed to concentrate its efforts to securing the passage of the Goeke bill (H. R. 19133) and the Gardner bill (S. 5474).

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say I am in favor of cheaper and better transportation facilities, under whatever name it may be, but I am not in favor as I have chasing the express companies and I am in favor as I have chasing the express companies, and I am in favor, as I have been for many years, of a marked reduction in express rates in this country. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] if that which the Clerk has just read is the sentiment of the farmers throughout the country. In other words, is that the kind of legislation they desire enacted into law and which they term a general parcel post?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, of course I can not answer with any absolute assurance, but my information is that these resolutions represent the views of the farmers' organization known as the National Grange and also of the Farmers' Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, there is a provision in this bill which reads as follows:

That after the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used or pay for any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel, steel underframe, or equally indestructible material, and not less than 20 per cent of the new equipment shall be put into operation annually after July, 1912; and after the passage of this act no contract shall be entered into for the construction of steel underframe cars.

This provision of the bill is intended to protect the lives of the men engaged in the Railway Mail Service. I think it is one of the most salutary provisions of the bill. In times gone by the men engaged in the Railway Mail Service, and up to the present time I may say, have been compelled to work in railway postal cars the superstructures of which were made wholly of wood, and every time we have had a wreck of a train the lives of many men engaged in this service have been lost. There are about 1,100 of these railroad postal cars in the service now, which are not constructed of steel or steel underframes. The policy of the railway companies has been for some time to construct their passenger cars of steel, and at present the wooden railway postal cars are wedged in between two steel cars in a train, and whenever a wreck occurs these railway post-office cars are almost sure to go to destruction, and the lives of the men in the cars are almost sure to be lost. In the last Post Office bill we had a similar provision to this, but in another body it was changed so as to make it useless.

When the bill came back to the House from the conference committee it was during the last hours of the session and at a time when it was impossible to give it the proper consideration, and the House was consequently obliged to accept the provisions in the bill as it came back from conference. The committee, however, on this occasion took the matter up and recommended the provision which I have just read. It is to be hoped that this provision will remain in the bill and become a law.

Mr. STERLING. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman stated there were 1,100 wooden-frame cars in service. I understood, however, that the cars more recently used in this service are iron-frame cars, are they not?

Mr. MADDEN. They are building some steel-frame cars, and they have some steel-frame cars under contract now, and this provision accepts the cars which are under contract and those which are already in use, but it prohibits the letting of any contracts for the construction of a steel-frame car which is simply a steel-frame car in the future.

Mr. STERLING. Does the gentleman know the proportion of the cars in the service-

Mr. MADDEN. There are 1,100 cars in the service that are built of wood, and it is to these 1,100 cars that this provision The thought of the committee was that it would be unfair to attempt to force the railway companies to put all the cars into steel frames and steel superstructures at once. As a matter of fact, it would not be practical to do it, but in order that no discretion might be left with any executive officer of the Government as to how rapidly the steel cars should be constructed the committee has provided definitely that each year at least 20 per cent of all the cars used in the railroad postoffice service shall be built of steel, beginning with the year 1912.

So that at the end of five years and a half all of the 1,100 cars will be remodeled or reconstructed, and that no car will be in the railroad post-office service after the 1st of July, 1917, except steel cars. This is as it should be. The lives of the men engaged in this service ought to be protected. [Applause.] This is the measure of protection which they ought to receive. There are no men in any service, not even in the Army, who do more patriotic work than the men engaged in the Railway Mail No man in any kind of employment risks his life more often than the man who is engaged in this class of employment. He takes his life in his hands every time he goes on duty, and it should be not only the duty of the Congress of the United States to give him every protection possible but it should be our pleasure to do it.

And I am glad that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were unanimous in their report for this provision in this bill. [Applause.]

I am glad that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, too, made some provision for a more definite workingday for the men engaged in the other branches of the postal This bill provides that 8 hours shall constitute a day's service. work and that the 8 hours' work shall be done within the limit of 10 hours. That gives the post-office authorities in every section of the country the right to call on every man engaged in the service for 2 hours beyond the time he is actually engaged in the transaction of the business for which he is employed. It has been said on the other side of this question that if we imposed the burden on the Post Office Department of compelling them to give an 8-hour day, with a maximum of 10 hours within the given day, it will embarrass the service; that it will make it cost more; that it will make it impossible to regulate the routes of the carriers. But I can not understand why the Post Office authorities can not so regulate the work as to give the men an opportunity of getting off duty within 10 hours from the time they are called on duty. They say in reply to questions that the mail deliveries on Monday, for example, are much heavier than they are on other days, and that is true. And in order to make it possible for the carrier to make de-livery on Monday of all his mail within the period fixed in this bill they will have to make the carrier routes much shorter than they ought to be made; that because of the shorter routes on account of the heavy mall on Monday the carriers will not be able to work more than five or six hours on any other day of the week. Well, we have provided in this bill for auxiliary service, and if that auxiliary service is to be employed the Post Office authorities can fix the routes with a view to employing the auxiliary carriers on Monday.

So that when they have performed their work on Monday they may not be required on other days of the week, and if the routes are arranged with that end in view the carriers in the various districts will be kept busy for the full eight hours every day.

This provision of the bill is a humane provision. It will give the men employed in the postal service an opportunity for rest, for study; an opportunity to be more with their families than they ever have been before. It now sometimes takes 16 hours for a man to do a day's work in some of the branches of the postal service, and we ought to fix it so that there will be no question whatever about the period of time that he is to be employed. There was a time not long since when letter carriers had an eight-hour day. The business of the department was then carried on successfully. The department seemed to run along smoothly. There seemed to be no difficulty about doing the work within the period of time fixed by the law. But the courts decided a case that came before them in such a way as to make the law nugatory. And so the provision of this bill is intended to remedy the evils created by that decision of the courts. I am delighted to know that this provision is to be made for these men.

Now, as to the clerks of the great post offices of the country, the clerks have been working anywhere from 8 to 12 hours a There was no provision made for compensation for overtime in any bill up to this. This bill provides that the department may require men to work more than eight hours. It provides, however, that when they work more than eight hours they shall be paid for the overtime they work at the same rate that they get for their regular employment, and that when they are required to work on Sunday they shall be given compensatory time off on some other day during the week.

This bill classifies the railway mail clerks. The classifica-tion does not go into effect until 1913, and so there is no provision made in this bill for an appropriation to cover the classification. But I understand that it is satisfactory to all concerned; not only to the authorities of the Post Office Department, but to the men themselves. This provision of the bill covers a long-felt want. It is simple justice to the men, and there are no men anywhere, as I have said before, not even on the battle line in time of war, whose services ought to be considered with greater care than those of the men who do this work in the Railway Mail Service.

Now, I wish to call to the attention of the House another matter that is proposed to be inserted in the bill, but which was not recommended by the committee, and that is the provision which calls for expenditures from the Federal Treasury for the construction of highways in the rural districts of the country. In the State from which I come the people gladly contribute of their own funds for the construction of highways, and I may say that this is true of almost every other Northern State. believe that we ought to have good highways. I am a believer in good roads. I believe that everything ought to be done that ingenuity can devise to make the roads of the country the best that can be had. But I believe that this is strictly a State function, and that it ought to be done by the States themselves. As a property owner in the State where I live, I have gladly contributed of what means I have had to help build the roads in my neighborhood. Illinois levies a tax on the abutting property. This tax is paid into the treasury of the township.

The township trustees or the highway commissioners have jurisdiction over the expenditure of this money. They expend ly. We are getting good roads. We are meeting the ons. We are abreast of the times. We are moving for-We are making progress. We have no complaint to conditions. We make no complaint because we are called upon to pay out of our own pockets for the construction of the roads that we use. Why should not every community throughout the land pay for the improvements that the community requires? Why should the Government of the United States be called upon to build the highways of the country?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows what this provision would cost if enacted into law?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I do not suppose that anybody knows what it would cost, but I am convinced that it ought not to cost the Federal Government one cent. Why? not organized to take over State functions. The Federal Government has no jurisdiction over this matter. It ought not to assume jurisdiction over it, even at the earnest solicitation of Members of Congress coming from sections where no good roads have thus far been constructed.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. MADDEN. I do. Mr. LEVER. I was just about to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he had read this bill with suffcient care to be able to state it as a fact that it is an appropriation out of the Federal Treasury to aid in the construction of good roads or is it a proposition to have the Federal Government pay to the States money out of the Federal Treasury for the use of State property?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, the gentleman is technically correct; but we ought not to be dealing in technicalities. We ought to face the measure squarely. It does not matter whether you use the language that this money is to be paid out of the Federal Treasury for the purpose of paying the State for the use of highways used as post roads or whether the money is to be taken out of the Federal Treasury to put the foundations into these roads and put the surface on the foundations. It amounts to the same thing. Now, of course the people of the United States are not taxed directly for the maintenance of the Federal Government, and it may be that they think in many cases that the expenditure of money from the Federal Treasury does not take it out of their pockets; but the truth is that it comes out of their pockets just the same; and if they were called upon to pay a direct tax, out of which should be paid the money for the construction of highways, they would object to it: and I. who have already been paying a direct tax for the purpose of constructing roads in my neighborhood, object seriously to it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I understood the gentle-man to say that he favored taxing the adjoining landowners, as is the system in his State?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The Republican national platform of 1908 said:

We recognize the social and economic advantages of good country ads, maintained more and more largely at public expense and less and as at the expense of the abutting property owners.

Does the gentleman stand by that platform?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not always believe every man who writes a plank in a platform knows just exactly why he writes it or what it means when he writes it. In this case I am opposed to the plank, whoever wrote it or whatever party adopted it, if the plank is as the gentleman read it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. May I interrupt the gentleman with the suggestion that it would be well for the gentleman from South Carolina to read all of that plank. I do not think he did. Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I shall be glad to have the gentleman read it.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I have no copy of it before me, but my recollection is that it declared in favor of the State and the minor subdivisions of a State improving the roads.

Mr. MADDEN. If it did, then it exactly agrees with my attitude.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MADDEN.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Did the city of Chicago, at the expense of the people of Chicago, furnish her pneumatic-tube service, so that the city fellow can sit down at his mahogany desk and have the mail shot up to him eight times a day? Do not the farmers all over this country help pay the expense for that service, and do not the farmers all over this country help to pay for the magnificent post-office building in the gentleman's city, and all these other postal facilities that they have for performing the governmental function of carrying and deliver-ing the mails? Do not the farmers help pay for all those things?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; they do. Mr. SHACKLEFORD. They pay 60 per cent of it.

Mr. MADDEN. And that is not all they pay for. But it does not amount to anything like 60 per cent.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Therefore, I suppose the gentleman thinks we ought to contribute it cheerfully?

Mr. MADDEN. The number of miles of pneumatic tubes in the city of Chicago is very small, and they are built by private capital and rented by the Government,

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Why did not Chicago pay for them

Mr. MADDEN. And I wish to say to my friend from Missouri [Mr. Shackleford] that the people of the city of Chicago and every other city in the Union help to pay the $43,000,000 annually that is paid to rural carriers who deliver the mail to the gentleman from Missouri and his rural constituents.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. You make us furnish the roads before you will do it, though.

Mr. MADDEN. And then I wish to say, in addition to that, if the highways in the rural districts are to be considered as post roads, the highways known as the streets in the great cities of the country are also to be considered as post roads, and that if the highways in the country are to be paid for because of the fact that the mails go over them, then the men who live in the great cities of the country will demand that payment shall be made out of the Federal Treasury for the construction of the streets in the great cities which are also used as post roads. I see no distinction. I see no justice in the contention that the man who lives in a city and owns property abutting on a street should be taxed for the construction of that street while the man who lives in the country and owns property abutting on a highway is to be relieved from such a tax. The same rule ought to apply everywhere. If country roads are post roads, then city streets are post roads. The Government of the United States has the power to come into the city of Chicago and tear up any street in that city without asking the consent of the local authorities.

They can tear the streets up, they can build their pneumatic tubes, they can operate these tubes without regulations from the local authorities. If that be true, why should not the Government of the United States be placed in the same position toward the citizens of the great centers that you seek to make with relation to the people who live in the more sparsely settled sections of the country? We are asking for no appropriation for any purpose out of the Federal Treasury that is not justified under the Constitution of the United States. The people who live in these cities are making no demands to put their hands into the Treasury of the United States for the construction of their streets. The people of the country districts are coming here and making demands that the Federal Treasury shall be used to construct their roads, and we object unless we are placed on an equality with the men that make those demands. We are citizens of the United States and our rights are equal to theirs. We have every right to make com-plaint, and the Constitution never intended that one class of citizens should do one thing and another class do another. The Constitution of the United States never contemplated the expenditure of money for the construction of highways in one place that it did not accord to every other place, and as a Representative from one of the great cities of this Union I solemnly protest on behalf of the people of that city to the expenditure of one dollar of the public money out of the Federal Treasury for the construction of any highway, anywhere, that does not give equal justice to the people of the territory from which I hall.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman speaks of dealing with all the people on terms of equality. In my district I know where some of my constituents get a mail three times a week, The gentleman from Illinois who speaks on this floor, who resides in Chicago when at home, gets his mail eight times a day. He does not even have to walk down the steps to get it; it is brought up to him and laid on his desk, and I presume the man who brings it to him must come with kid gloves on [laughter] eight times a day, while my constituents, as I say, get theirs but three times a week; and then the gentleman from Illinois gets up here, with all his pneumatic-tube service and eight deliveries a day, and howls about the equality of citizenship.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me say to my distinguished friend from Missouri that it is the cities where the mail is delivered eight times a day that furnish the money to run the postal service. The receipts of the Chicago office, about which the gentleman complains, for the fiscal year ending December 31, 1911, were $20,868,000, while the expenses were but $6,478,000, leaving a profit of $14,390,000, while the losses on the Rural Delivery Service of the country were $28,000,000, and the territory from which the gentleman from Missourl comes helped to create part of this loss.

Nobody complains about that. I am not complaining about I am not complaining because there was a loss, for I believe that every citizen in the United States ought to have every facility that can be legitimately afforded by the Government in the delivery of mail.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Is the gentleman opposed to the free rural delivery?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not; I have just said that I was not. I have just said that I was not complaining about it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Is it not a great convenience and for the interest of those living in the great cities to have this means of communication with the people who live on the rural free-delivery routes?

Mr. MADDEN. My dear boy, I have made no complaint about it. I have said that I favor the distribution of mails to the rural routes. I merely said that in the distribution of mails on those routes we made a great loss annually, while in the distribution of the mails on the city routes we made a great profit.

That is what I said and that is what I still say.

Now, if anybody can tell me what sense or what justice there is in the claim that the Federal Government should build the country highways, and convince me of it, I would be for it; but until somebody can show me some good reason why it should be so, why the city dweller should be discriminated against, I shall be against it, and I hope the good judgment of the membership of this House will see the necessity of defeating the proposed legislation for taking money out of the Federal Treasury for the construction of rural-carrier highways, or whatever you choose to call them. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Chair to notify me when I have occupied 10 minutes.

Of very first magnitude to the postal service is section 7 in this bill, a section upon which there will not be much discussion here largely, I fancy, because it is technical. It relates to the reorganization of the Railway Mail Service. The Railway Mail Service, as gentlemen know, is at the center of the whole postal system. The railway mail clerk who stands in front of callettle the care is the secretical terms. in front of a distributing case is the essential agent of the man who puts his mail in the expensive pneumatic tube, which has just been mentioned here, and the dog sled in Alaska, between the busy city carrier and the rural carrier winding his way down pleasant country lanes, between the manufacturer and the retailer, between producer and consumer. This Railway Mail Service besides is the finest skilled governmental service in the world. It has three characteristics as such-first, its hazards; second, the mental and physical strain put upon the majority of the men who are in it; and, third, the skill it demands.

What are the hazards? Let us see. For instance, it very rarely happens that this Post Office bill is debated here without some current item of news, some tragedy of the day, entering into the consideration of one item in it. Two years ago while we were debating this item, the item in regard to the Railway Mail Service, five men in that service were carried in a snow slide off the summit of the Cascade Mountains to death in the canyon below. A week ago this morning three of the men in the service, working to the very last with the mails, went down with the Titanic. The hazard is not exceptional or unusual. It is continuous and ever present. In 1910, 27 men were killed in this service and 527 injured. The year after the death list went to 12 and the injured list to 719. Now, these men work on the fastest trains in the country, usually in the car which is next to the engine. And usually after every great wreck the name of a postal clerk is in the list of dead and

What of their skill? There is no skill in the world in governmental service to compare with it. Nearly every railway postal clerk must know something like 10,000 distributions. There are men to-day going out of New York City on fast trains who are distributing letters by towns, cities, and villages in California. The throwing of one letter into one box turns it north across the country over the Northern Pacific; the throwing of it into another box southward over the Santa Fe or the Southern Pacific, to gain in the one instance or the other the matter of an hour or two in delivery. Every man in the Railway Mail Service must keep constantly in touch with every change in schedules, every connection made between trains over the United States.

What of the strain? There is no service in the world, governmental or other, where the strain exceeds that upon the individual in this service. Let me cite an instance to this committee. The men who run from New York City to Pittsburgh and return travel 888 miles on four hours of sleep. There are several instances like that in the country.

Here, then, is the greatest hazard, the greatest skill, and the greatest mental and physical strain. This service, at the center of postal things, has grown up during the years not in a hap-hazard way but largely without thorough reorganization until now. Pay has been based largely upon car space occupied. The man who happened to belong to one of the larger crews where two or three full postal cars are moving out of New York City for Buffalo stood a chance for repeated promotions from the lowest grade to the top.

The man who happened to be running upon a smaller line in an apartment car, which made probably only a single trip out and back in a day, with a small amount of mail, might be equal to his brother out of New York City in skill, but promotion was not for him. One of the chief values and virtues in the measure that we propose is that we take away from the old system the matter of basing pay upon space, and make a new classification basing the pay upon the speed of the trains, the complexity of the distribution put upon the man, and the hours of duty that he is at work, arranging the classification in this bill so that whether a man be out on the smaller line which makes its single apartment-car trip a day with a small amount of mail, or running on a trunk line out of New York City or Chicago with a heavy complement of men, he will have an equal chance for promotion in all the different parts of the system. It is something that has been long delayed. It may not be satisfactory, I may say, in all its features to everyone, but it was the nearest thing that the combined knowledge of the postal clerks themselves, the Post Office Department officials, and the committeemen in this House could accomplish. And in conclusion, Mr. Chairman

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. COOPER. May I ask the gentleman a question? Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly. Mr. COOPER. How long do these postal clerks work a day who run these eight hundred and eighty and odd miles, with only four hours' sleep?

Mr. MURDOCK. They make the round trip of 888 miles on four hours' sleep.

Mr. COOPER. That is about 24 hours of run; it must be. Mr. COOPER. That is about 24 hours of run; it must be. Mr. MURDOCK. Not between New York City and Pittsburgh; I hardly think that.
Mr. COOPER. There and back.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is probably that. Of course they do not keep that up, I will say to the gentleman, from day to day. They have their lay-off. However, the strain is great.

And, Mr. Chairman, with these men working in a place of hazard as they do, making the sacrifices they do, skillful as they are—and they average, let me say, the country over in their work 98 per cent with 100 per cent as a standard—it seems to me that it is fitting that Congress should take their claims, consider them as we have, and draft into the law a new, modern, up-to-date system of classification commensurate with their efficiency, their measure of industry, and their fidelity to the service. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address the House for a few minutes in reference to the bill providing compensation for the use of highways for carrying rural mail, which has been introduced by Mr. SHACKLEFORD, at the request of the authors of various road bills at this session. The bill reads as follows:

The bill reads as follows:

That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 0 feet wide composed of shell, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 0 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace reads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 0 feet wide composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, on constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, on constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, on constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, on constructed and crowned as to

I am aware of the fact that many Members of this House have been and are now opposed to the Government embarking in the building of public highways, and these gentlemen are apt to conclude from a mere glance at this bill that it proposes to have the Government build roads. Such, however, is not the case, and I trust that before any Member of the House determines to oppose this bill that he will do the authors of the bill and himself the justice of carefully considering it. If he will do this, he will see that the bill does not provide for the building of roads by the United States Government, but provides simply that the Government shall pay a State for the use of its roads in the delivery of mail upon the rural routes, just as we annually pay the railroads practically $50,000,000 for the transportation of mail over their roadbeds, and as we provide in the pending Post Office bill for the payment of ferriage and toll for the use of private roads. One of the excellent features of the bill is that it does not interfere in any way with the jurisdiction of the State over its roads and at the same time protects the National Government by providing that no compensation shall be paid as rental for a road unless that road comes up to certain specifications set forth in the bill, which question is to be determined by an agent of the National Government.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes, sir.
Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. What, in the judgment of the gentleman, will it cost the first year if this bill is enacted into law?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will wait just a minute I will get to that and tell exactly what each class will cost.

Admittedly it is the function of the Government to deliver the mail, and it is the duty of the Government to perform that function. In the cities the Government, in order to perform this duty, may erect a public building or may rent a building from some citizen for a post office. It may perform its duty of delivering mails upon the rural routes by building post roads, as authorized in the Constitution; by daily using the roads of a State without paying any rental, as it has for a number of years; or by paying a reasonable rent for the use of the roads, as provided in this bill. It seems to me that if the Government is to be extravagant in its expenditures for facilities to assist it in performing its function in the cities, when it goes outside of the municipalities to the rural roads it should not be come a mendicant upon the States, daily using and injuring the roads and never paying a cent for their use. We should not there?

spend millions to erect monuments of marble and stone to facilitate the delivery of mail in the cities and then refuse to pay even a reasonable rent for the same purpose in the country. Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question right

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the gentleman refers to post-office buildings in cities?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not a fact there is just as much money spent proportionately for post-office buildings in the country out of the Federal Treasury as there is in the cities?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am satisfied such is not

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, surely. Mr. LEVER. It makes no difference in the argument.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. And, as suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina, it makes absolutely no difference in the argument.

Mr. BOWMAN. Is it not a fact the city is benefited quite equally with the country by the building of good roads, by their getting their produce cheaper, and also would not the Government be benefited by having good roads by getting their con-tracts much cheaper, so that it would probably quite cover the amount that is expected to be paid under the bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I think the constituents of the gentleman from Chicago will so inform him when he goes back if he votes against this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I will vote against this provision, all right. Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I would like to ask the gentleman if he introduced a bill having in view road construction in this country?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I did, sir. Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Can the gentleman state how many of those bills were introduced in this House out of which this composite bill was produced?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. As near as I recall, about 20.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Is it not 22 or 23?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I attempted to get all the

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. But the gentleman will not say as many as 30.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; I think about 20. Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Very well. The gentlemen who introduced these several bills had one plan or another for the purpose of getting money out of the Federal Treasury to build country roads.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will read the bills he will see that there were many plans proposed-

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Was not that the idea of the gentlemen, the purpose of all of the gentlemen in introducing these bills, simply to commit the Federal Treasury to the building of country roads?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Either to assist the States in building roads, or to have the Government build them.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And so you agreed on a

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Is the gentleman going to make a speech or did he desire to ask a question?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And you have all agreed on this bill here to get money out of the Federal Treasury to build

tleman to make a speech, but I will ask the chairman of the committee to give him time. As I have only 15 minutes I can not let him take up all my time.

The farmer who travels the road, through the payment of taxes, contributes to the maintenance of the roads. The automobilist who drives his car into a State is required to take out a license, the theory of such a tax being that, as he uses the roads of the State, he should pay for such use, and ordinarily the money derived from this source is converted into the road fund. Why should not the Government, in like manner, pay for the use of the roads in carrying on its business?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. What would be the ordinary toll for a private individual over these roads which you have charged $25 a year for an ordinary mule and a cart?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will ask the gentleman how big is a piece of chalk or how long is a string?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. You are charging the Government $25 a month for the use of a carriage going over it

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It provides $25 per mile per year on a macadam road. If the gentleman has an automobile and goes into a State other than his own, they will charge him almost that much for traveling 10 miles.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The carrier has not an automobile.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. But nevertheless he uses the roads, and some of them have automobiles and motor cycles.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. What do you charge the ordinary rig for toll?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I must refuse to yield to the gentleman any further time. This year we are paying the railroads $48.971,000 for the transportation of mail, which is at the rate of $206.21 per mile. Part of this, of course, is compensation merely for the use of the roadbeds. For the use of the provides that only $25 a mile shall be paid. For the pneumatic-tube service, which has been installed in five cities in recent years, the Government will pay for the fiscal year 1912 $925,636.40

For railway mail cars our annual appropriation is about $5,000,000. The people are entitled to have their mail delivered as promptly as possible and an appropriation for pneumatic-tube service or any other service that will facilitate the delivery of mail in the cities is doubtless a wise and proper expenditure, but the Government should not be willing to appropriate money for such facilities in the cities and then when it comes to paying a reasonable rent for the purpose of facilitating the delivery of mail upon the rural routes refuse to do so and "sponge" upon the States.

The passage of this bill will not bankrupt the Government. According to an estimate furnished by the Office of Public Roads, the first year the bill is in operation we would have, under class A, 60,000 miles of road which, at $25 a mile, would be $1,500,000; class B would have a mileage of 125,000 miles, at $20 a mile or $2,500,000; class C would have $00,000 miles, at $15 a mile or $12,000,000; making a total expenditure under the bill for the first year of $16,000,000.

The effect of the bill undoubtedly is to encourage the improvement of the roads. If passed now it would not go into effect until July 1, 1913, and my opinion is that its passage at this time would cause the States to immediately improve their roads so as to secure the largest possible appropriation under the bill, and during the next year we would witness an era of road building unparalleled in the history of the country. I believe that in every State we would find this true, that the people of a county having poor roads for which they would receive but a small appropriation, would inquire into conditions prevailing in other countles, and as soon as they learned that another county with better roads was receiving a larger appropriation, they would demand of their county officials that the roads be improved, and if the officials failed to improve them they would have to hunt other occupations. If this should prove true and the roads be improved, as I believe they will, then there would be some increase in the appropriation in after years, but the small increase would be more than justified by the great benefit to the people.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman kindly, if he can, toll us just what it would cost the second and third years? Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That, I will say to the gentleman, would depend entirely upon how many miles of road were improved.

Mr. RUBEY. May I answer the question asked by the gentleman? The best estimate that can be made upon that proposition is between $18,000,000 and $19,000,000, provided that the roads are complete and ready to fall under the respective classifications as provided in this bill.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is that the second year, please? Mr. RUBEY. That is when they are all completed. Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is when they are all completed.

Mr. RUBEY. I want to say further, if the gentleman will permit-

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will excuse me, I have but a few minutes more.

There are some Members who frankly admit that they are opposed to any legislation on this subject, and, while we differ with them, we have no serious quarrel with them. Our quarrel is with those few Members who at home profess to favor road legislation and if this bill is voted on as it now stands will vote for it, but who hope to kill it by amending it.

Whenever a Member takes the position that the rent for the use of roads in class C should be greater than that for class A he either has not considered the bill at all, or, having considered it, is opposed to it and is deceiving himself into believing that he can vote against it and then go home and explain his oppo-sition by professing to believe that the higher rental should be paid for the roads of class C instead of class A.

If they think that they can deceive the farmer in this way they are mistaken. He will understand that this bill is based on the idea of paying rent for the use of the roads; that the Government does not pay more rent for the use of a poor postoffice building than it does for a good one. Furthermore, he will understand that to pay a higher rental for the use of a poor road would be an inducement to the people of the States never to improve their roads, because should they do so they would receive a smaller appropriation. It would place a premium on indolence instead of progress.

Another objection urged by gentlemen who are opposed to road legislation of any kind, but who will not admit it, is that the bill should provide that the money appropriated as rent be expended upon the roads for the use of which the money is paid. We do not provide that the money paid as rent for a post-office building should be used by the landlord in repairing the building. We only require of him that the building be kept in proper repair. In like manner we provide in this bill that rent shall be paid only for roads coming up to certain specifications, and if a road for which rent is paid is not kept in proper condition it will no longer come up to these specifications and it will no longer be paid for. This insures the maintenance of the roads in proper condition by the States.

Those gentlemen who are opposed to the Government aiding in any way in the improvement of the roads of the country have a wonderful opportunity to enlighten the voters of the country at this time, as we are approaching a national convention, as to exactly what weight, in their opinion, should be given to pledges contained in the platforms of the two great political parties. The Denver platform, adopted by the Democratic Party in 1908, contained this positive declaration:

We favor Federal aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

The Chicago platform, adopted by the Republican Party in 1908, contains this less positive declaration:

We recognize the social and economic advantages of good country roads, maintained more and more largely at public expense and less and less at the expense of the abutting property owner.

Mr. MADDEN. Read it all.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can tell the gentleman what the rest is.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is not fair about it. Tell us all

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The platform says:

In this work we commend the growing practice of State aid and we approve the efforts of the National Agricultural Department, by experiment and otherwise, to make clear to the public the best methods of road construction.

But will the gentleman contend that when the national platform of the Republican Party declared that it favored the improvement of the public roads "more and more at the public expense" that it referred to the States and not the National Government?

Mr. MADDEN. Out of the State treasury.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Then why was it put in the national platform? Why did you not confine it to your State platforms? You know it was put in there to lead the farmers of the country to believe that the Republican Party, like the Democratic Party, was in favor of Federal aid to roads. That was the impression it was intended to make and did make upon the farmer, and if by your votes you tell him now that you did not favor it, he will know what weight to place upon the declarations which you make in the Republican platform of this year.

When we come to the Democratic Party there can be absolutely no question as to what was meant, and the question is squarely up to the Members on this side of the House to redeem this campaign pledge or else notify the voters of the country that platform pledges are made solely for the purpose of securing votes and without any intention of being redeemed.

This bill offers an opportunity to all sincere advocates of road legislation to unite. It would be almost impossible to secure unity of action upon any bill appropriating money to the States to be used by them in building roads, because we could never agree as to how such an appropriation should be made—whether upon the basis of population or of area—and, in any event, there would not be the same equitable division among the States as is provided for in this bill. Again, any proposition to have the Government undertake to build roads would involve the certain disagreement as to where such roads would be built, and the building of great highways across the country, while doubtless of great benefit to the automobilists, would not be of any service to those who live in rural districts and are in greatest need of improved roads. The improvements of the roads of the several States which would be accomplished under this bill would benefit all kinds of travelers, and particularly benefit the farmers who use the roads for business as well as pleasure and who are entitled to relief at the hands of this Congress.

We can gather an idea as to the universality of the benefits to be derived under this bill from the fact that to-day the rural delivery traverses 42,000 different highways of the Nation and comes into contact with 20,000,000 people living in the rural districts. We have in the United States 2,199,645 miles of public highway, of which 190,767 miles, or 8.66 per cent of the total, are improved. The Office of Public Roads estimates that 90 per cent of the travel over our public highways is confined to 30 per cent of our roads, and the improvement of 440,000 miles of public roads would practically meet the present demand throughout the Nation. It is therefore evident that the improvement of what may be called the rural delivery roads, with a total of 1,010,000 miles, will more than meet the present demands of the country.

In the early struggles of the railroads in this country, when they were being constructed, the Government donated to them millions of acres of our public lands, valued at over $2,000,000,000. Since 1875 we have appropriated $592,395,000 for rivers and harbors. We have appropriated for public buildings, up to June 3, 1911, $213,376,000, and for the purpose of road building in the Philippines and our other possessions, $800,300,000. During this period we have appropriated for the building and improvement of public highways in the United States-not 1 cent.

Anxious as are the people of the cities for appropriations for public buildings, I believe that the business men of every city recognize that the improvement of the highways approaching the city is of greater benefit to them than the erection of an ornamental post-office building, and gladly would they consent to have a part of this immense public-building fund diverted to the improvement of the rural free-delivery roads.

Three hundred million dollars of farm products are hauled annually. The average haul is 9 miles in the country and the average cost 23 cents per ton per mile, which makes the total cost of hauling farm products $600,000,000 a year. According to the estimates of the Director of Public Roads, the cost of transportation over the magnificent roads of England, Germany, and France, by wagon, is only 10 cents per ton per mile. Even if it were half the cost of transportation in this country, it is evident that if we would improve our roads to the standard of the European roads, we could save for the American people in a single year $300,000,000.

If we had such a system of good roads throughout the country the farmers would save on the transportation of the cotton crop $5,760,183; of the wheat crop, $10,256,058; of the corn crop, $12,709,278.

The average haul of cotton is 12 miles; the average load is 1,800 pounds, or four bales of 450 pounds each. At 23 cents per ton per mile the cost of transporting a 500-pound bale of cotton is therefore 69 cents a bale.

In order to appreciate these figures let me say to you that the State of South Carolina, in which I reside, last year produced 1,677,204 bales of cotton weighing 500 pounds each. At 69 cents a bale it cost the farmers of that State $1,157,270.76 to transport this crop to market. Of course this does not take into consideration the hauling of the cotton to the gin and back to the farm. It includes only the cost of hauling from the farm to the market. If the roads were improved to the standard of the European roads we would save one-half of this, or $1,257,970.50. In addition, we produce something like $38,647 tons of cotton seed. It cost $3 a ton to transport it, or for the entire crop $2,515,941.23. The improvement of our roads to the European standard would save one-half of this, or $1,257,970.50.

It is estimated that the farmers of our State use several hundred thousand tons of commercial fertilizers a year, and the cost of transporting it from the railroad to the farm is more than $1,500,000. If our roads were improved one-half of this amount, or $750,000, could be saved.

It cost the farmers of South Carolina $1,444,000 to transport their corn to market. If one-half of this could be saved by the improvement of the roads, it would be a saving of $722,000. So that, without taking into consideration the hauling of farm supplies, it is evident that improved roads would revolutionize the profession of the farmer and greatly increase his profits.

It is not only in the reduction of the cost of transportation that the farmer will benefit by improved roads, for we all agree that a good road increases the value of the land adjoining it, the increasing being estimated at from $2 to $9 per acre. In South Carolina we have 19,565,800 acres of land, and if our roads were improved so that the value of the land adjoining it increased but $1 per acre it would mean an increased wealth of $19,000,000, the taxes upon which would greatly aid in the maintenance of the roads.

Good roads contribute not only to the financial profit of the farmer, but also to his educational advancement. Where we have good roads we have good schools and good attendance upon those schools. According to the statistics of five States where good roads prevail, the average attendance is 78 out of 100, and in five States where the people are not progressive enough to improve their roads the average attendance is 59 out of 100.

It is true that a man does not want to move into a community where the roads are poor. It is one of the first questions asked when he goes to home seeking. The census figures show in 25 counties taken at random, where 40 per cent of the roads are improved, that the average increase of population is 30,000 to the county. In 25 counties showing only 1 per cent of the roads improved the average loss of the population was 3,000 to the county.

While good roads mean more to the farmer than anyone else, because he uses them more, the road problem is by no means the problem of the farmer alone. It is the problem of the city man, whether he be merchant or laborer, just as much as it is the problem of the farmer. It is the problem of the consumer as well as the producer, because the cost of transportation enters into the cost of every commodity when it is placed on the market, and the increased cost of such commodity makes the consumer share with the farmer the burden of the bad-roads tax.

For several years we have heard the "back-to-the-farm" movement. I believe that good roads in the country will do more to solve the problem of keeping the boys on the farms than all the organizations and movements that have been inaugurated in recent years and at the same time will assist in the solution of the problem of the high cost of living. This is a practical measure. It removes the road question from the realm of discussion to the realm of action, and when your votes shall have been cast for or against it the farmers of the country will be able to tell whether or not you have been sincere in your promises to aid in the improvement of the public roads. [Applause.] Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] if I shall go ahead with the time?

Mr. MOON of Tennssee. Just as the gentleman chooses.

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I*desire to direct the attention of the committee to H. R. 23419, introduced by myself, to provide for a parcel-post system based on distance transported, which, with one or two amendments to make more definite the operation and administration of the rates provided, I intend to offer as a substitute for the parcelpost sections of the pending Post Office appropriation bill.

During the present Congress more than 20 bills providing for various kinds of parcel posts have been introduced. These bills range from a bill providing for a limited experimental parcel post on rural routes only to a bill to condemn the express companies of the country and give the Government a monopoly of the business of transporting packages and parcels now included in both mail and express matter and include various flat-rate parcel-post schemes.

No one can question the determination of the House, at least, to pass some legislation of this character in the light of the unanimous vote of the House to consider the various parcelpost proposals in connection with the pending appropriation bill. No one will question the determination of the House to give the country some relief from the extortions of the express companies when he reflects that a bill has been reported by a committee of this House fixing maximum express charges for distances from 25 to 3,000 miles and connecting the express service with the rural-route postal service in a practical copartnership between the Government and the express companies in the transportation of express matter.

Recognizing the inadequacy and unfairness of some of these propositions, the inherent viciousness of others, as well as the seemingly insurmountable objections which they presented, I began to investigate the subject with a view of drafting a law which would meet the known objections, provide adequate service, and give relief from the extortionate charges of the express companies.

In drawing the bill and determining the rates I found that there were several limitations and considerations fixed by public sentiment, public policy, and existing law which should be Among these considerations and limitations were:

First. That the traffic should be self-supporting without paying a profit to the Government.

Second. That a flat rate would obviously lose on long hauls while paying a profit on short hauls. This would grant a subsidy to merchants at a distance from customers-a subsidy paid by those who would be overcharged for short hauls.

Third. That no rate should be higher than the present rate for the same weight, and that no rate should be higher than the rate provided for traffic originating in foreign countries.

At the outset it occurred to me that the social, political, and commercial activities of the average individual, for whose convenience it seems to me the law should be made, if made at all, were carried on within a comparatively small area; that these activities decreased as the distance from the place of their inception increased. Roughly speaking, these activities in the largest degree are confined to a zone not more than 50 miles in diameter. I found that within the limits of 50 miles a parcel could be transported by railroad for less than 1 cent per pound under existing postal contracts. I found that the overhead charge on fourth-class matter, which includes everything but the cost of transportation, amounted, inclusive of rural-route service, to 4.36 cents, and exclusive of rural-route service to 3.66 cents per pound, so that it was possible under existing contracts to carry a parcel weighing 1 pound 50 miles or less for 5 cents. The injustice of a rate of 16 cents per pound, which is the present rate, for a haul of not more than 50 miles is at once ap-

Now, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] in the admirable study he has written upon this subject, finds that the average transportation cost on mail matter under present contracts is equivalent to 9 cents per ton-mile.

Mr. LEWIS. May I interrupt the gentleman right there?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I want to ask the gentleman-

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I want to say that for much of my figures I am indebted to the study made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis].

Mr. LEWIS. I only wish to interpolate at that point by saying that the rate of 9 cents a ton-mile refers to the equipment and mail.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I understand that. Mr. LEWIS. And if the mail alone be regarded, for 1908, the charge is 13 cents per ton-mile.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Taking the figures submitted by the Post Office Department to the Hughes Commission, October 21, 1911, the average rate is found to be somewhat higher, approximating 10 cents per ton-mile on the fourth-class mail matter, exclusive of equipment. This rate is approximately equal to 1 cent per pound for a journey of 250 miles.

Again, referring to the overhead charge on fourth-class matter, it is observed that while the charge amounts to 4.36 cents per pound, the average weight per piece is approximately 4 ounces, so that the overhead charge per piece amounts to 1.09 cents, and the total charge, including transportation, to 2.5 cents per piece. Now, it is obvious inasmuch as present over-head charges will not be increased to any large extent by increasing the weight limit or by increasing the business, inasmuch as we will have the same number of postmasters, rural carriers, and other employees, that the overhead charge per plece or per pound will be very greatly diminished on parcels in excess of 1 pound in weight.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Can the gentleman specify just what he means by "overhead charges"? I notice that is a term he is using.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I will say in answer to that that the Post Office Department includes in overhead charges everything except the cost of railway transportation, and I have done the same.

Therefore I have taken as a basis for overhead charges in the rates provided in the bill an irreducible minimum of 5 cents per parcel up to 5 pounds in weight and have added 1 cent per pound for each pound in excess of 5 up to the weight limit of 11 pounds.

This charge will be amply sufficient to pay the proportional charge for salaries of postmasters, Railway Mail Service, departmental expense, and so forth, on each package.

With this basis of overhead charges and the basis of 10 cents per ton-mile, or 1 cent per pound for 250 miles, it is comparatively easy to work out a system of rates, determined according to distance, which are entirely feasible and which will be selfsustaining under the present contracts of the Post Office Department with the railroads. For instance, the overhead charge on a maximum distance of 1,000 miles would amount to 10 cents, the transportation rate to 40 cents, a total of 50 cents. The rate under the bill is 64 cents, leaving 14 cents as a margin of safety and to cover any additional haul which might be involved upon a rural route or for delivery in a city.

On a 7-pound package traveling a maximum distance of 1,800 miles the overhead charge would be 7 cents, the transportation charge 52 cents, making a total of 59 cents, whereas the postage rate under the bill would be 66 cents, leaving a margin of safety of 7 cents. These figures, of course, are for the maximum haul in each zone.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I do.

Mr. LOBECK. Have you taken into account the cost that the Treasury pays for accounting?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I have taken into account only the charges which the department reported to the Hughes Commission. The figures are absolutely based on the figures which the department reported to the Hughes Commission. Commission. I do not know whether they include the accounting charges on

Mr. LOBECK. The accounting charges should be included.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I think they do not include There is a good deal of expense that is not assignable to any particular class, but is apportioned to different classes

Mr. LOBECK. Does the gentleman think the accounting is included in that?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I do not think it is. It has never been included heretofore.

Suppose we have an 8-pound package traveling 2,500 miles; the overhead charge is 8 cents, transportation charge 80 cents, making a total of 88 cents. The rate under the bill is 96 cents, leaving a margin of 8 cents.

Of course the margin of safety on the shorter and minimum distances in each zone will be correspondingly larger. instance, in the 1,000-mile zone, taking a minimum distance of 250 miles on a 3-pound package, the overhead charge will be 5 cents, the transportation charge 3 cents, making a total of 8 cents. The rate in the bill is 22 cents, leaving a margin of 14 cents.

Again, for a 6-pound package traveling 500 miles the transportation charge is 12 cents, the overhead charge 6 cents, making a total of 18 cents. The rate under the bill would be 40 cents, leaving a margin of 22 cents.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to inquire what is the limit of weight in the gentleman's bill?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Eleven pounds.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. You do not put in a limit of 100 pounds?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I should say that is not possible under the present railway mail contracts. It would be quite possible, of course, if the bill condemning the express companies became a law.

On a nine-pound package traveling 2,000 miles, the overhead charge is 9 cents the transportation charge 72 cents, a total of 81 cents, while the rate under the bill is 108 cents, leaving a margin of 27 cents.

It may be said with some justice, particularly with reference to the rates on the minimum distances in a zone, that the rates are higher than necessary. It was desired in the first place to insure the rates being high enough to be self-supporting, and the difficulty could not be avoided without greater complication in rates than seemed desirable or necessary.

In addition, there is less difference in the proportion of the rates to the actual cost on maximum and minimum distances than now obtains in express rates. For instance, the express rate is 80 cents for a five-pound package from San Francisco to Walla Wall, Wash., a distance of 1.017 miles; to Cheyenne, Wyo., 1,270 miles; to Granada, Colo., 1.455 miles, and to Fostoria, Ohio, a distance of 2,520 miles—a difference in distance of 1,500 miles, but no difference in rate.

It is unnecessary to cite further instances, as the margins of safety on each rate can easily be determined for the maximum distance from the figures already given.

In addition to the pound rates provided in the bill, rates have been provided for fractional parts of a pound or ounces graduated according to distance, and so arranged that the rate for any number of ounces under the bill is less than the present rate and less than 12 cents per pound.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Certainly.
Mr. BORLAND. I understand that the gentleman is discussing a bill that he has drafted for zone rates for a parcel

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman's bill contemplate that the railways shall be paid the same for carrying Government parcels as for carrying first-class letters?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. The same rates as it is pay-

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman think that there is an inherent difficulty there in competing with the express companies, where the Government is paying first-class postage rates for all kinds of mail matter, and attempting to compete with the railways on a different basis?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I want to say right here that there is a very general impression that the difficulty with the parcel post lies in the fact that the Government pays a higher rate for transportation than the express companies.

Mr. BORLAND. It is true, is it not? Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Yes; it is true; but a greater difficulty is the fact that the overhead charges in the Post Office Department are infinitely greater than the overhead charges paid by the express companies.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman think that that last statement is correct—that the overhead charges of the Post Office Department are infinitely greater than the overhead charges paid by the express companies?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Undoubtedly.
Mr. BORLAND. Do not the accounting of the express companies and the maintenance of their offices involve a large amount of overhead charges?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Yes; but I want to say to the gentleman that on about 9,000,000,000 pounds, if I remember correctly, in weight of packages handled by the 10 large express companies, the overhead charge was about $60,000,000, and on about 1,250,000,000 pounds of mail matter the overhead charge in the Post Office Department was about $140,000,000, so that the overhead charge there is much larger per pound and per parcel.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know what the gentleman includes in the term "overhead charges."

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I include everything except transportation cost.

Mr. BORLAND. Then the gentleman includes the cost of handling every particular piece of first-class mail. As I understand it, the cost of first-class mail is not so much in the weight as in the handling, and the cost of the other class of mail is largely a question of weight and distance; but in the case of first-class matter, and especially registered matter, it is 98 per cent a question of labor on each particular letter.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Not so large a proportion as that. The overhead charge on first-class matter is about 85 per cent of the total cost of handling it. But the rates in my bill are based on the cost of handling fourth-class mail matter, and take into consideration both weight and distance transported. I think I have here somewhere the figures per pound. The gentleman is partially correct, but I do not see where his remarks have any bearing whatever.

Mr. BORLAND. No; the question is this: Can we compete with the express companies by paying the railroads on the basis that we are paying them now for first-class letters?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Absolutely. I think every rate in this bill is ample to pay the transportation charges and the overhead charges and have a margin of safety. Mr. BORLAND. I wanted to hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I have gone into that.

The bill provides for three distinct classes of parcel-post service. First, a rural-route service for which a rate is provided of 5 cents for the first pound and 1 cent for each additional pound or fraction, with proportionate fractional rates for any number of ounces less than 1 pound. To cover the cost of additional equipment and labor on the part of the rural carrier, it is provided that one-half of the receipts on each rural route shall be paid to the carrier in addition to his salary, but not to exceed $600. Second, a city delivery system which was originally limited to 5 pounds, but in an amendment which I intend to offer in connection with the bill the limit is raised to 11 pounds, and it provides that the Postmaster General is authorized in any city where the traffic warrants it to establish a wagon collect and delivery service.

The rate of postage for this service is 5 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound up to and including 5 pounds, and 1 cent per pound for each pound in excess of 5 pounds up to and including 11 pounds, with proportionate fractional rates for parcels weighing less than 1 pound.

Third, a zone system, based on zones of 50, 200, 1,000, 1,800, and over 1,800 miles. The rates provided for the zone system for pounds or fractions of pounds are as follows:

On the 50-mile zone, 7 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound. In the 200-mile zone, 8 cents for the first pound and 3 cents for each additional pound. In the thousand-mile zone, 10 cents for the first pound and 6 cents for each additional pound. In the eighteen-hundred-mile zone, 12 cents for the first pound and 9 cents for each additional pound. Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If we establish an 11-pound rate at this time by the passage of this bill, does the gentleman think the Government is prepared to take care of the business?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I think so. I have provided that the law shall not go into effect until the 1st of October, which I think will give the Government ample time to make the necessary arrangements to take care of the traffic.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. October of this year?
Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Yes.

All shipments traveling more than 1,800 miles in a direct line are required to pay 12 cents per pound flat. In addition to the pound rates, fractional rates are provided on a graduated scale for parcels weighing less than 2 pounds, so that no rate under the bill is higher than the present rate of 1 cent per pound, and no rate exceeds the maximum of 12 cents per pound. Yet the rates of the bill are from 25 to 50 per cent under the present express rates for the same distances; and it is believed if the bill is passed it will bring very substantial relief from the present exorbitant rates of the express companies. I will print with these remarks a comparison of the rates under the bill and express rates for the same distances.

The rates and zones have been so graduated as to reasonably protect the country merchant in his own market while providing him with a cheap and adequate system for the delivery of parcels on rural routes or to near-by towns.

It is claimed that the zone system is impossible in the matter of administration. Nothing could be further from the fact. It is not my intention, either in the bill or in this discussion, to attempt to fix the method under which the rates shall be determined, but I have investigated the subject sufficiently to satisfy myself that the system can be worked out without great complication of rates and so that any postmaster or rural carrier can easily and quickly determine the rate from his post office to another post office by reference to a book or map.

In addition the bill empowers the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an investigation of postage rates and to change rates provided by the bill whenever a change is warranted by conditions of the service, distance transported, and other service elements and risks involved therein, but the authority thus given only extends to the service embraced in the zone system.

The provision which empowers the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine the rates within the zones after investigation was drawn with a view to obviating the very serious objection on the ground of public policy and of administration to fixing a rigid system of rates by law. It was designed with a view of affording an opportunity for a review of rates by some duly constituted authority with appropriate reference to the various elements of cost which enter into the transportation of an article. It is possible that additional powers could be appropriately given to the commission, but it is thought that the authority conferred in the bill is sufficient to enable the commission to review the rates and change them in every instance where they are found to be inequable.

I might say in this connection that it has been suggested that the Interstate Commerce Commission should be authorized to fix the rates of railway mail pay to the railroads. Personally, I think that provision might very well be incorporated into the law. The only difficulty is in the fact that the railroads now have contracts with the Government, which contracts can not be changed by law until they expire. We could, however, provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission should investigate the cost of transporting the mail and fix-the rate, which should be the rate in each particular section of the country as soon as the present mail contracts expire.

Now, it is claimed that a parcel post—and this argument has been directed chiefly against the flat-rate schemes—will injure the rural town and the rural town merchant and accelerate the already too great tendency to centralize business as well as population in large centers.

I am not in sympathy with the effort which it seems has been made to set the farmer against the country merchant and the country merchant against the farmer in the controversy that has been waged over the parcel-post question, for I recognize that the country merchant and the rural town are just as necessary to the profitable, comfortable, and enjoyable conduct of the business of the farmer as the farmer is to the profitable, comfortable, and enjoyable conduct of the business of the rural merchant. I believe that the time has not yet come when we can seriously consider the elimination of the rural merchant as a factor in our system of distribution. Any law which unfairly militates against him or places him at a disadvantage with outside competition in his own market will eventually destroy the home market of both the farmer and the country merchant. The country town furnishes a home market for many of the products of the farm which would otherwise have no market at all. If a few of the people of the town or of the farmers in its vicinity took advantage of the alleged bargains of the mailorder house, it is possible that something could be made thereby; but if the whole community should take the same view, it is apparent that the small country town would soon cease to survive.

The farmer knows this as well as anyone else, and he does not desire to bring about this result.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield to a suggestion right there, when he talks about ruining the country merchants?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Was not the same argument used when we sought to establish the Free Rural Delivery Service and also when it was proposed to build electric railway lines?

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Absolutely so; and the gentleman can remember when the department store in the city was considered a means for absolutely doing away with all kinds of small business in the country towns and everywhere

It is said that the farmer is not demanding this legislation. This is true in the sense that he is not demanding an opportunity to trade in foreign markets as cheaply as he trades in his home market. But the farmer sometimes has business with the express company. Usually, when he pays the express company's charges it incites his wrath, and he determines that the next time he will patronize Uncle Sam's parcel post. ingly, when he again has a parcel to send to the neighboring town he takes it to the post office, and there he finds that if it weighs more than 4 pounds he can not send it at all, and if it weighs less than 4 pounds it costs him more to send it by mail than by express. He is indignant. His wrath was just and his indignation is righteous. Everybody knows it; even Congress knows it; but no one does anything about it, least of all Congress. The business man and the laborer have exactly the same experience. Neither the farmer nor the business man nor the laborer is looking for a special privilege or a subsidy. looking for the American privilege of a square deal in the matter of transportation rates on small packages, and he ought to have it.

I would not be heard in advocacy of a measure which would even tend to destroy the small town. I live in one myself and know its advantages. I have been a member of business men's clubs; I have been secretary of a merchants' association. All my life I have heard the arguments and advanced them myself against the parcel post, but I must confess that it seems to me that the zone system absolutely eliminates the last argument against the parcel post.

Nor would I be willing to assist in the passage of a law which would tend to accelerate the steady trend of business and of people to our large cities. This bill will not tend to bring about that result, for under its provisions the rural merchant will have a cheap and efficient system for delivering his goods to the farmer, while it will cost the merchant at a distance from two to nine times as much to get into the same market. gress can not by legislation build a fence around the home market of the country merchant. It can and it should give to the rural merchant the advantage in that market which his contribution in taxes and in time and labor to the common welfare entitles him as against the merchant who pays taxes to the support of another municipality and contributes to the common welfare of another community a thousand miles away.

Add to the advantages which this bill gives the rural merchant the advantage of personal acquaintance, the advantage of the personal equation, the advantage of his stock close at hand, the advantage of his reputation for honest dealing, the ability to give credit, and telephone communication, and he need have no fear of competition from anyone.

Again, this bill gives to the merchant, the laborer, and the farmer another facility to comfortable and enjoyable living, a facility which particularly relating to the farmer will make farm life easier and more enjoyable, will make markets more accessible, and thus discourage leaving the farm and the small towns to search for these facilities in the larger centers of trade and population. [Loud applause.]

I ask unanimous consent to print, in connection with my remarks, a table of comparisons of the rates under this bill with the express rates for the same distances, and also to print a copy of the bill and the rates under it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to print a copy of the bill and a statement prepared by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN].

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I had a gentleman come to my house to make a little visit. is a constituent of mine. This gentleman, during the evening conversation, said that he had a directory that he would like to send down to me, from which I might get some names of my constituents to whom I might send out some of this "bunk," as gentlemen around me call it. He also said to Mrs. Akin, "I have got a book that I want you to read, and I will send them both to you when I get home."

Now, I have the original package here just as he sent it to me. It weighs 3 pounds and 7 ounces. It came to my office and the young man at my office paid 55 cents for it. Now, then, that was satisfactory. I thought nothing more of it, but in a day or two I received this insult added to injury, if I may call it so, and this is only two or three days ago.

On the envelope is "Adams Express Co., local cashier." Why,

I would not take $100 for this.

Date of delivery, it says, from St. Johnsville to this place. Consignee, T. AKIN. Local address, 256 House Office Building. Charges collect, 55 cents. Should have been 50 cents, and there is a refund of 5 cents.

If I went clear down to Seventh Street to get that 5-cent express order it would cost me 10 cents to get it. [Laughter.] Look at it. There it is; and this only happened two days ago. Now, I took the pains to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and saw a gentleman there by the name of Mr. Lane. I asked him if that was the proper charge for that package. They weighed it down there and he told me that it weighed 3 requires and 7 courses and the member disc rates would be pounds and 7 ounces, and the merchandise rates would be, prior to August, 1911, 65 cents for that package. Since August 1, 1911, it would be 50 cents. If it had been described as books it would be 26 cents. Talk about highway robbery and monumental gall!

Now, every man that ever saw an express company knows that they ask you what is in the package; and even if they did not they ought to know that it contained two books. Any man with common sense could feel of that package and it would not take more than a horse doctor to tell that it was two books. Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Yes.
Mr. LEWIS. Twenty-six cents is the prepaid rate for which the package would be carried from one end of the continent to

Mr. AKIN of New York. Yes; and no doubt this man would have been glad to pay it if they had told him so.

Mr. CALDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Certainly.

Mr. CALDER. After the experience with the express company in this instance I want to ask the gentleman if he favors pany in this instance I want to ask the gentleman if he favors condemning them and paying them a large sum of money for their good will and their property?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to have all my good ideas assassinated by the gentleman coming at me about something which I know very little about and do not care anything about. If I had my way, it would not take me long to take my ram's-horns and go down and blow their place out of business, and there would be a few blankety blanks along with it. Why yes, I would do most anything to those follows. with it. Why, yes; I would do most anything to those fellows; I would get at them with a meat ax. I will answer you fair and square that I would put them out of business if I had the opportunity.

Now, I will give you another little instance of their performances. About two years ago I sent to Atlee, Burpee & Co. for a package of Golden Bantam seed corn that I wanted.

I wanted to plant some in my little garden. I sent them 40 cents for it, and in about a week I got a notice from the express agent that there was a package there for me and that the charges were 80 cents. Well, Mr. Chairman, the express company still has the package. I never took it away.

Mr. LOBECK. The next time I think the gentleman better send to some Congression.

send to some Congressman.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I think that would be a good idea. That is about all I have got to say upon the parcel-post proposition; but I am in favor of a parcel post. I have not made a very deep study of it. I do not know enough to make a deep study of it. I am only a poor farmer, and no doubt there are a great many lawyers here who could figure this thing up in better shape than I can; but I know that my people want a parcel post—the best that they can get. I was elected on that proposition-to come down here and stand for a parcel post; to vote for a parcel post-and I propose to do it for the best that we can get.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman want a limited parcel post or a general parcel post?

Mr. AKIN of New York. A general parcel post. Oh, no; do not give me any lemons. I have had lemons enough, and my friend from Tennessee the other day expressed the wish that he did not want to hear anything about the dinner pail and the lemon. But I am afraid my friends will get some of that dinner pail and the lemon before they get through next fall's campaign.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question for my information about the express package that he has here. He says that it weighs nearly 4 pounds.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Three pounds and seven ounces. Mr. CANNON. Under the proposed parcel-post legislation in the bill before us the charge is 12 cents a pound, is it not? That is the bill. That is what is proposed, without regard to the fraction of a pound, so that it would cost 48 cents to transport this parcel by the proposed parcel post. Why does not the gentleman amend the bill so that it would be carried for Mr. AKIN of New York. What? The whole parcel for 5 cents?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.
Mr. AKIN of New York. Oh, I would rather pay more for it than that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. That is all right; but the gentleman paid 5 cents fare to go down and collect the rebate of 5 cents.

Mr. AKIN of New York. No; I did not. I have not done that. I would not go down there for anything and collect that 5 cents—take it away from them. I am going to have that little piece of paper framed and show it to my constituents, those who work from 12 to 17 hours a day and wish for a glimpse of that good old McKinley dinner pail of 1896.
Mr. CANNON. I am afraid the gentleman is entering upon a very expensive campaign.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Oh, I will take care of my campaign when the time comes. It will not compare with the amount of the gentleman who expects to succeed me here in Congress. They say he has already expended $23,000 for the congressional delegates in my district, and he is a poor carpet, manufacturer at that, and needs the job to make ends meet.

Mr. Chairman, herewith find copy of an Adams Express Co. money order for 5 cents:

PRESS CONCERNS TO BE PROSECUTED—INTERSTATE COMMERCE C MISSION AUTHORIZES SWEEPING CRIMINAL SUITS AGAINST THEM.

MISSION AUTHORIZES SWEEPING CRIMINAL SUITS AGAINST THEM.

Charging that they have knowingly and willfully swindled many thousands of shippers by the collection of double rates, the interstate Commerce Commission yesterday instructed Federal district attorneys throughout the country to institute sweeping criminal prosecutions against practically every express company in the United States. Documentary evidence substantiating the charges has been placed in the hands of these officials.

It is alleged by the commission that nine express companies, against which prosecutions will be brought, have in their treasury no less than $$1,957,893, a large proportion of which they obtained through swindles intentionally perpetrated upon the public.

It is the request of the commission that special grand juries be called to hear this evidence, and that indictments be returned without delay against the guilty officials of the various companies. Separate prosecutions will be brought against the Adams, American, National, Globe, Great Northern, Northern, Southern, United States, and Wells-Fargo companies. The proceedings will be instituted at New York, Chicago, San Francisco, and other cities where the violations have occurred. It is not the intention of the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a raid on the express companies and bankrupt them, which it could do with the evidence in hand.

So conclusive does the commission believe its evidence to be, that it has not even waited until the completion of its investigation before beginning criminal prosecutions.

President Taft was challenged to a joint debate on "Federal patronage abuses" in a letter addressed to him yesterday by Representative Akin, of New York, the only Member of Congress officially designated as a progressive Republican. The challenge follows:

VICIOUS USE OF POSTMASTERS—TERMITTED TO NEGLECT THEIR DUTIES, THESE OFFICIALS ARE CHARGED WITH CORRUPT PRACTICES IN THE ELECTION OF DELEGATES TO CHICAGO.

It is simply ridiculous for this administration to say that it is conducting the Post Office Department as a business institution and not conducting it as a political machine. Never in the history of our national politics have postmasters and post-office inspectors cut such figure in politics have postmasters and post-office inspectors cut such figure in politics as they are in this campaign. Thousands of these officials are daily neglecting their official dufies to devote their time and influence toward securing delegates to the Chicago convention for Mr. Taft. These officials are acting on orders from headquarters. They have been dragooned into sacrificing a public service for politics.

And yet with it all both the President and the Postmaster General have frequently of late recommended that all presidential appointees of this class should be blanketed under civil service and "taken out of politics."

Is not this one of the greatest fallacies of our present-day Government? Why should men holding Federal jobs, who are paid at the expense of the people, dictate to them who they should vote for?

Should not these men serve the people in their official capacity as business men and not as political bosses?

Never before has this question been presented more forcibly than in this campaign. In the primaries and conventions so far held in the various States these Federal officials have shown more activity than ever before has this question been presented more forcibly than in this campaign. In some instances they have bossed, and in some instances they have bossed, and in some instances they have before has this question been presented more forcibly than ever before has this question been presented more forcibly than postmasters. He has condemned both the administration and the postmasters. He has condemned bo

"In this contest, whenever the people have had a chance to express themselves they have come out unmistakably for the right side. We have lost only where there has been cheating and theft of delegates by violence and fraud, or where a community, a boss-ridden community, has sat supine and permitted itself to be defrauded of its rights."

This is only one incident where postmasters endeavored to dictate to voters in cities, towns, and county precincts. They endeavor to pull off the same performance in their respective communities because they are ordered to do so. Failure to act, of course, means ultimate dismissal "for the good of the public service."

President Taft wants postmasters taken out of polities, but it is very evident he does not favor taking them out until at least 1913.

All postmasters, regardless of their class, should be placed under civil service. They should be retained purely on the merit system. They should be barred from politics, and any such activities should be ground for dismissal. The people are growing tired of being bossed and dragooned in conventions and at the polls.

Mr. Chairman, again let me say that I have endeavored to Mr. Chairman, again let me say that I have endeavored to bring on a go between myself and the now President of the United States by sending to him a challenge for a joint debate on the question of Federal appointments, particularly in the Post Office Department. There is no doubt in my mind that if he would go up into the Post Office Department, in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster General, with a golf stick and put as much force behind it as he does in hitting some of those little white balls on the beautiful green lawn of the golf grounds he would be doing this country a great and lasting service. I am not very long on great judicial temperament, probably not as long on judicial recall as my friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], is; but I would be very glad to witness a go between the gentleman, Mr. Gardner, and that buzz saw which contains the patent inserted teeth, so that in case he got one over on him the new patent inserted tooth would fall right into its place, and it would continue on in the same way, and the gentleman from Massachusetts would never know what hit him. There would not be enough left of him to puncture with a hypodermic needle for the purpose of refrigeration.

My former speech, which was printed in the Congressional RECORD, on page 3096, was so full of homely truths that it offended the dignity of the House, and as the author were no political brand and was cut out as a maverick, I intend to eliminate the parts wherein matters of truth are mentioned without dignity, but I wish at this time to insert a clipping from the Washingon Post of April 22, 1912, "Express companies immune":

EXPRESS COMPANIES IMMUNE?

The decision rendered by Federal Judge Hollister, declaring that the Interstate Commerce Commission has no regulative jurisdiction over express companies looks to be, at first blush, as hard a facer for the Government as the recent Supreme Court ruling upholding the monopoly clause in the patent laws. Judge Hollister finds that an indictment against the Adams Express Co. on the ground of overcharging is invalid, for the reason that the company is neither an individual nor a corporation, but a stock association, and that it would be necessary to proceed against its 10,000 stockholders in order to secure its indictment. The interstate commerce laws, it seems, fall to take cognizance of other than corporations and Individuals, and should Judge Hollister's decision stand, the recent investigation of the express companies, which revealed a maze of alleged infractions of the laws, comes to nothing.

panies, which revealed a maze of alleged infractions of the laws, comes to nothing.

Thus the whole fabric of the Government's extensive campaign against big business appears to be crumbling at the feet of judges and juries. The express-case decision supplements the failure to convict the beef packers under the criminal clause of the Sherman law and the adverse patent-law decision already mentioned, the latter of which setbacks probably will prompt the Government to abandon the more important suits now pending against industrial organizations.

Congress, if so disposed, could breathe new life into the restrictive laws and again hale accused parties into the courts. Bills amendatory of the Sherman and patent laws are pending in that body, and it is to be presumed that the Interstate Commerce Commission will ask to have its hands strengthened. Certainly public sentiment will not acquiesce in the abandonment of corporation regulation because of the lack of effective laws. effective laws.

Following is some data taken from the Philadelphia North American of April 22, 1912:

A judge has ruled that the law can not be made to apply to the Adams Express Co., but to enforce the law the Government must indict every one of the 10,000 stockholders. But hush! Don't lay implous hands on the ark of the covenant.

Up to this time, although I have not received any letter of acceptance from my challenge to debate the question of Federal post office appointments with the President, I think the only opportunity that either the gentleman from Massachusetts or I will have is to go out by ourselves and fight it out together. But I insist upon the weapons used being either golf sticks or some kind of a little ding dangs that they play ping pong with or a little tennis racket.

But there are some possibilities, which are herewith shown by an editorial clipped from the Washington Times of April 22, 1912, which I insert, and with this clipping I wish to insert a letter from Gen. A. L. Mills to Maj. Beecher B. Ray:

President Taft, it is announced, is going to spring a political sensation—something positively scandalous—during his invasion of New England this week.

So interesting. But so painfully vague. Can it be that the President's scandal will be a detailed statement of the amount of money spent in getting his nomination in 1908? Is it possible that Charles P. Taft is going at last to let the country know how much he invested in getting a Presidency in the family?

Or is the President preparing to air the whole inwardness of the affair of Maj. Ray, Army officer, labor boster, political pet, and protégé of Mr. Taft?

Or may we expect illumination of the Norton patronage letter and the scandal of using political patronage, first to destroy the progressive wing of the party and afterwards to pull off jobbed conventions in the interest of Taft?

interest of Taft?

Or are we, perchance, to get the exact terms of the deal by which the Taft campaign was turned over to the Lorimer gang, with a Lorimer lieutenant as director general?

Or may we hope for a confession that will clear up all the uncertainty about the inside facts of the dicker that made Ballinger Secretary of the Interior?

There are so many possibilities in this promise of airing a real political scandal that it is difficult to preserve patience and calm pending the great exposé.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF, Atlanta, Ga., September 3, 1910.

Maj. Beecher B. Ray,
Paymaster, United States Army, Atlanta, Ga.
Sin: I am directed by the Chief of Staff of the Army to inform you that imputations against you have been made to the Paymaster General in the form of reports alleging illicit relations between you and Mrs. Blank, the wife of Mr. Blank.
These reports are of such gravity as to call in question your character as an officer and a gentleman, for, if the allegations be true, your conduct should be characterized as reprehensible and deserving of the severest condemnation.
Should you desire to take steps to clear your record of these imputa-power.

In the absence bowever, of such effort for vindication, it is my duty to admonish you as to the future, while under my command, that any misconduct as an officer on your part will not be treated with immunity.

Acknowledgment, in writing, of the receipt of this communication is desired.

Very respectfully.

Brigadier General, United States Army, Commanding.

I am also inserting the letter of a young man, Mr. Blank, to Gen. Whipple, asking to be relieved from the company of this man Ray, who is still holding his office, evidently without any fear of being removed by the President of the United States:

ATLANTA, GA., June 25, 1910.

ATLANTA, Ga.. June 25, 1910.

My Dear General: Circumstances have arisen that make it absolutely necessary that I be relieved from duty as personal clerk to Maj. B. B. Ray at the carliest possible date. This is not an application, and you will readily see after reading this communication just why I can not comply with paragraph 424 of the Paymaster's Manual, especially the last sentence.

Refore proceeding any further I first desire to impress on you my desire for absolute secrecy relative to the information contained herein. I have a father $2$ and mother 73, who celebrate their golden wedding anniversary in October, also two children, and I would brave any circumstances or conditions rather than bring shame and disgrace upon them or have anything made public that I am about to write. I should much have preferred a personal interview, but it seems impossible, as I could not get the leave just now to come to Washington and could not afford to do so at this time.

I have loved and honored my wife above everything else on earth, have trusted her as implicitly as I would my mother, and you can readily see to just what desperation I have been driven when I write this communication.

I have probably been partly to blame for what has happened by allowing Mrs Blank to be in Maj. Ray's company to the extent that she has, but in extenuation of this fact I have only to say that I trusted her to the extent that I did not think it possible she could do wrong.

Within the past few days something, which I can not mention, forced she hes, but in extenuation of this fact I have only to say that I trusted her to the extent that I did not think it possible she could do wrong.

Within the past few days something, which I can not mention, forced me to the belief that there was something wrong. Last night I had an all-night talk with my wife, and she finally confessed to me that she had on several occasions been intimate with Maj. Ray; that from the first few months that I was assigned to him he had forced his attentions on her, had done everything in his power to make her untrue to me, but that up to the time of our leaving Honolulu she had repelled him, thinking that she could easily keep him at a distance, and not telling me because she considered that she was perfectly able to take care of herself; and as our relations were pleasant and we always seemed sure of a pleasant station, etc., she kept the matter to herself. Upon our arrival in San Francisco we had rooms at the Hotel Manx, and it was there that he first succeeded in overcoming her scruples, securing the key between the rooms and leaving the office in the afternoon, stating that he was attending to private business, only to go immediately to the hotel and enter my wife's room. The arguments he used were particularly contemptible and disloyal to me, he stating that it was only a question of time until I lost my position on account of my debts: that when I did lose my place he would see that she never needed anything, etc. The details are sickening, and I can not bring myself to write more along these lines, except to say that since then he has continually importuned and annoyed her, making all sorts of promises and threatening that he would ask for a different clerk and make me lose my position if she did not comply with his demands. My wife is really but a child in experience, being II years my junior in age, naturally of a trusting and confiding disposition, and although, of course, I can see that there is no excuse for her actions, yet there are certainly extenuating circumstan

I consider Maj. Ray's actions particularly unworthy those of an officer and gentleman and particularly ungrateful, in view of the fact that during his trouble in Manila I was the only friend he had in the Pay Department there. I kept him advised while in the States that he had enemies, stood by him at all times and made enemies for myself; when he and Mrs. Ray came to Manila. Mrs. Blank and myself gave up our own home, which we had furnished there, to them and went out to board; we have nursed both he and Mrs. Ray during illness and I-have done everything in my power to forward his interests, both personal and official. I could not have been more surprised and pained.

Now, I am prepared to forgive and try to forget Mrs. Blank's part of this unfortunate affair. She leaves here on June 29 and goes to Washington, where she will be from July 1 to 6; from there she returns to her home in Blank for the summer. Maj. Ray had promised me two months' leave immediately upon completion of the maneuvers at Chickamauga Park, and I was then going to come to Washington and have made overtures to get a position with Mr. Blank or Mr. Blank, two of my creditors, and try to work off some of my indebtedness.

You can readily see that my daily association with Maj. Ray is almost unbearable—that every time I look him in the face I want to kill him—and that a continuation of our relations is impossible.

As I am entirely innocent in the matter, I desire a transfer and am willing to go anywhere with anyone rather than continue where I now am. I would love to get a chance to come home and see my people, but I am willing this to tell you that my desire is to avoid publicity. No one will ever know that I have written you this letter; I will not let Mrs. Blank know under any circumstances that I have written you and I would prefer to live and bear the present situation rather than have anything come up publicly. What is your advice and how shall I go to work to obtain a transfer, this being inevitable?

In conclusion, it would appear that Following is a letter taken from the hearings, No. 15, before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, written by the President, William H. Taft, to Gen. Whipple:

ten by the President, William H. Taft, to Gen. Whipple:

BEYELLY, July 5, 1910.

Dear Gen. Whipple: I have read the letter of Blank, which you have shown me, because you knew that in times past I had had a personal interest in the welfare of Maj. Ray. I have no relation to Maj. Ray that prevents my directing you to take the same disciplinary action in respect to him as in the case of any of your subordinates. It seems to me that it would be wise to send Gen. Garlington or a trusted assistant to inspect Ray's accounts and those of his clerk, as well as the charges Blank makes, and, if the facts turn out to be as Blank states them, to separate Blank from Ray at once. While Ray's conduct, if Blank's charges are true, should subject him to the severest condemnation, there seems from Blank's language and telegram to be such a condonation by him and his wife that it would be well to avoid the demoralizing scandal for the Army involved in court-martial proceedings, which would place a stigma on Blank and Mrs. Blank they could never recover from. Ray could be told that his superiors know his fault and have provided against it, but in the interest of his victims and the Army it was deemed best not to present it to a board on condition that he avoid such conduct in the future. These suggestions are upon the assumption that Blank's statements are true and that Gen. Garlington finds them to be so.

I do not favor court-martial proceedings in such cases where there is condonation, in order to prevent scandal. The Army suffers, the parties suffer, and only the prurient readers of such trials receive any advantage. The discipline enforced does not outweigh in its benefit for the Army the injury to the prestige of the Army and the demoralization it causes. You can show this letter to Gen. Garlington and Gen. Oliver, but I would prefer that it do not go on your official files.

The course I suggest is the one it seems to me best with any paymaster, whoever he is. Maj. Ray did me some services of a political character years ago

It appears from reading the hearings before this Committee on War Department Expenditures that this man Ray was seriously afflicted with appendicitis whenever it was necessary to have a change of station and that circumstances go to show that he was very handy with false keys and was able to open doors in hotels whenever he found it convenient to do so.

As I was passing down by the White House even Pauline, the cow, carried a look of shame on her face when I brought the matter of these letters to her attention. Taking these extracts and data and then referring to my former speech, printed in the RECORD on page 3096, will show and probably convince one that this whole political institution in Washington can only be compared to a Nebraska feed lot on a warm summer day just after a warm rain, stirred up by the numerous feet of the cattle contained therein.

Although this may be a homely expression coming from me, known to the newspaper fraternity in Washington as a graduate of a veterinary college, granted that I wear hand-me-downs, and with that expert precision of the usual farmer from the twenty-fifth district of New York who chews "5-cent ante" and expectorates with the best of experts, I could, with satanic glee, enjoy the chance or opportunity to take any one of that Post Office bunch down, particularly that very honorable First Assistant, and with the skill of a veterinary surgeon thereby cause to be injected a concoction of sufficient quantity and quality of nicotine essence, causing thereby synchysis.

Before closing, I wish to pay my respects to the daily tollet paper known as the New York Sun, which has been so kind and considerate in paying me high compliments as it does-officiated over by the tertiary afflicted (sauvages) aristocracy, and hope that they will keep on with the good work.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Conry having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19212) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3812. An act to regulate public utilities in the District of Columbia and to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the duties and powers of a public utilities commis-

S. 268. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Rhode Island;

S. 4257. An act for the relief of the estate of Charles C. Benton and others; and

S. 4456. An act for the relief of the estate of Silas F. Baker.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Evans].

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, the postal service is one of the branches of the Government service that shows the pulse of the people, as by close study of it we can always judge whether business is improving or not. When the revenues of the Post Office Department show a normal, healthy increase from month to month it is the best possible evidence that our country is not only prosperous, but that we are improving from day to day in our business relations. When the revenues of the Post Office Department show a decrease or remain at a standstill, it is another evidence that business is stagnated, and it is time for men in public life to devise ways and means for removing whatever obstacle is in the way. During the brief period that I have been a Member of this House, I have endeavored to give close personal attention to matters of public interest, and particularly to questions affecting the postal service of our country. I maintain that the postal service of the United States should be the model one of the world, and that every improvement consistent with the progress of the times should be instituted in the service to raise it to the highest possible standard.

In order to bring about this condition of affairs I believe that the first requisite is a satisfied and contented force of employees in the postal service, working in harmony with the officers of the department. To my surprise I found on investigation that the employees in the postal service are working under adverse conditions in many respects, and in my humble way I have tried to lay before individual members of the Post Office Committee many grievances of the employees that have been brought to my attention.

In section 1, under subdivision "Railway postal-car service," a provision is inserted that will, to my mind, provide for the ultimate protection of the railway mail clerks, whose lives are in constant danger, in the discharge of their duties, from defective postal-car construction. These employees of the Government should have every possible protection thrown around them while in the performance of their official duty, as they are constantly working under a severe strain, and their work is not only exacting but extremely laborious.

Section 7 of the pending bill provides for the reclassification of the railway postal clerks, which is but an act of justice that will be appreciated by the railway postal clerks and will meet with the approval of the public.

The provision in section 1 which provides for the promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks and carriers to the highest grades in their respective offices will undoubtedly remove a condition that has been the cause of much discontent and dissatisfaction on the part of the employees. From inquiries I have made I believe that with an appropriation as is recommended by the committee, together with the normal changes in the service caused by deaths, resignations, and removals, that there will be sufficient money in the hands of the department to permit of the promotion of every clerk and carrier who earns it. I do hope and trust that there will not be any further cause for the charge of favoritism by the employees against those who have charge of recommending these promotions.

Section 5 of the bill will regulate the hours of labor of the clerks and carriers to eight hours per day, and provide for compensatory time for those employees who are required to work on Sunday. Mr. Chairman, I have given this subject considerable time and investigation and there is no section of the bill that I believe will meet with more universal approval than this one which regulates the hours of these employees. When I first started my investigation and inquiry I was surprised when I learned that the letter carriers had the benefits of the eighthour law taken from them through a decision of the Court of Claims on a test case made by the Post Office Department officials, and that the post-office clerks have not for any great length of time had the benefits of an eight-hour law.

We are living in an age of progression, and the tendency of the times and the policy of the Government is to reduce the hours of labor to not more than eight hours each day. officials might just as well strive to keep back the tide or to keep the world from moving on as to stand in the way of public opinion and progress. The recommendation of the committee on this question is simply what I term long-delayed justice, and I trust that the House will do its full share in remedying the present condition of the working hours of the clerks and carriers by acting favorably on section 5 of this bill. Section 6 is one that I believe will appeal to every citizen of our country who believes in free speech and the right of peti-Since 1902 the employees of the civil service have been prohibited by Executive order from presenting their grievances to Congress except through the heads of the department under which they serve. This order, which originated with President Roosevelt on January 31, 1902, was reissued in an amended and more stringent form by President Taft on November 26, 1909. I attended one of the sessions of the American Civic Federation in this city on March 5 and listened to a defense of this order by one of the officials from the Post Office Department who no doubt represented the Postmaster General. The whole strength of the contention of this gentleman seemed to be based on the supposition that employees of the Government should have no right either to express an opinion or complain of grievances unless he did so through his superior officer, and the question of whether a grievance or complaint should even be considered was to be decided by this superior officer. The sur-prising thing to me is that the civil-service employees have tolerated this condition of affairs, and I am not at all surprised at the large number of resignations from the civil service. I believe that this "gag rule" as it is justly termed is un-American and there is nothing whatever to warrant its being permitted to continue in force. Time after time the attempt has been made to break the spirit of the working people of this country, but when the shackles became unbearable there has always been such a revolt as to make the heads swim of those responsible for their petty tyranny. I have always requested employees to consult with me on matters affecting their interest and believe that it is my duty to listen to all respectful appeals and complaints and in order that these employees will not be further handicapped, shackled, and gagged I trust that section 6 of this bill will meet with the approval of every Member of this House.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I consider the three legislative propositions attached to the Post Office appropriation bill providing for the condemnation of the express companies for the use of the Post Office Department, Federal aid to post roads (rural routes), and publication of the names of editors and owners of newspapers to be the most important propositions considered by this Congress, and I desire to go on record as favoring all of these measures, PARCEL EXPRESS.

A parcel post is usually understood to mean a Government express business carrying packages of a maximum weight of 11 pounds at a flat rate per pound.

A parcel express usually means, literally, a Government express business in connection with the Post Office Department carrying packages up to a maximum weight of 100 pounds, which is the minimum weight charged for in freight shipments.

OBJECTIONS TO PARCEL POST.

A flat-rate parcel post limiting packages to 11 pounds is of no great importance to the rural population, and of no danger whatever to the merchants in small towns. True, the rural weller will be able to have small packages brought out to him from his town, but as a distributor of merchandise generally, marketing the produce of the farm, it is of no value whatever.

There is now a very bitter fight being waged by the merchants of small towns against such a parcel post, and, on the other hand, there is an equally vigorous campaign being carried on by patrons of rural routes for such legislation,

If the real truth were known about the effect of the usual proposed parcel-post scheme, the fears of the merchants would be allayed and the disappointment of the rural-route people would be most keen. The real effect will not be noticeable on either side. What the merchant fears is that his business is to be ruined, and what the farmer wants is to be connected up with the merchant and consumers of his products. that he has not had this connection accounts, in a large measure, for the drift of the farmer to the city and the resulting high cost of living and scarcity of produce.

Let us see why a flat-rate parcel post limited to 11-pound packages will neither hurt the merchant Lor help the farmer as a means of distribution of merchandise. In the first place, no flat rate can be proposed that will not either rob the shipper or the Government, or be of no use as a mover of merchandise. An 8-cent a pound rate, for instance, would be prohibitive on a short haul, as a 100-pound package would cost the shipper $8 for the shortest possible haul, while the express company would take it for about 50 cents. In this case the shipper would be robbed if he were foolish enough to patronize the parcel post. On the other hand, the longest possible haul of 3,600 miles would cost him only $8 by parcel post, the same as the short haul, whereas the express company finds it must charge $14.87 for transporting the 100-pound package. In this case the Government would be sure to get the business and stand the loss, while the express company would get the short haul and take the profit.

It is argued by the advocates of a flat rate that there would be an average struck, so that there would be no loss in the long run to anyone; but this argument does not take into account that such a rate would not move the traffic except in Nor does it take into account the manifest dishonesty of a flat rate. Such a rate would not fit the short-haul shipper at all, as he could compete with it with a wheelbarrow when anything larger than the smallest packages are concerned, and if the rate was made sufficiently low to meet the demands of the short haul the long haul would bankrupt the Govern-It would thus appear that a flat-rate parcel post is of very little importance one way or another to the country as a commercial proposition.

FAVORS BUYING OUT EXPRESS COMPANIES.

Therefore, if this Congress would do anything that will mean anything to the people, it must provide for a complete parcel express and carry merchandise up to 100 pounds, which is the minimum weight charged for by freight.

It is equally apparent that the Government must wipe out the present occupants of this field, the express companies, in order to save the duplication of service. Some contend that the Government could not get the service of the railroads, as the express companies have them tied up with contracts, and that it would be cheaper and better to buy their plants and enter into a completely established business at once. Others contend that the express companies are interlopers into this field and that they never had any constitutional right whatever to the small-package business, and that the railroads can be forced to give the Government the same service it now gives the express companies.

However this may be, if the Government can buy out the express companies at a figure that represents their actual assets, it would be cheaper and better, no doubt, and fairer, in view of the fact that the Government has permitted them to take the small-package business away from the Post Office Department, to take over the express companies rather than to undertake to run them out of business by competition. This might be a long and wasteful operation.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] has gone into this subject in an exhaustive manner in Document No. 379, showing how perfectly feasible and practicable the scheme of a parcel express is. He shows that the tangible assets of all the express companies do not exceed $29,000,000. The earnings last year were about $12,000,000, or about 45 per cent on their actual assets. Their franchises, good will, contracts, and so forth, would have little, if any, value if the Government went into the parcel-express business, as outlined above; yet, allowing $10,000,000 for these intangible assets, the total is less than $40,000,000. If the Government should take over these express companies at this figure and continue to charge the same rates now charged by the express companies for the first two years, it is believed the savings in operation by substituting a stamp for the extensive accounting system, and other savings, would increase the profits sufficiently to pay the purchase price in about and the railroad, and to the farmer who planted the orchard two years, when the rates could be cut at least to one-half of the present rates, besides giving the country a universal service. GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

There will be some of our timid brothers raise the cry of Government ownership against the parcel express proposed, which involves condemnation of the express companies, but their fears should be allayed when they find themselves absolutely unable to draw a line between the mail and parcel business-to be able to tell at what point the Government should stop in the service it is now rendering the people. Taking over the express business has the same relationship to Government ownership that the present mail service has. If any gentleman would advocate turning the mail service of the country over to private enterprise then he should also oppose the Government taking over the express companies. If the Government can give a better and more universal service in the distribution of mail packages than can private corporations, then for the same reasons it can give a better express service than can private enterprise. The fact that the Government mail service is now in close communication with every part of the country, and that absolutely no other private service exists that could duplicate this service, and if it could it would be an intolerable monopoly, ought to be proof conclusive that the Government is the only agent that can render a universal express service to all the people. The fear of Government ownership ought not to deter anyone from supporting this measure, unless he holds to the belief that an express company or some similar private corporation could give the country a better mail service than the Government now gives us.

GOVERNMENT ONLY AGENT THAT CAN GIVE UNIVERSAL EXPRESS SERVICE. It must also be apparent to anyone who studies the question that the Government is the only agent that can give the country a universal service of this character. The Government now has established mail routes into every nook and corner of the country, ready for immediate service in small packages, and can be gradually developed, as the rural mail-delivery system was developed, as the demand increases. There is no way that a rural express giving a universal service can ever be successfully established on an economical basis save through the Government mail service. If we leave it to private enterprise we must either duplicate the Government service now on rural routes or permit private express companies to use our rural carriers as they do the railroads, and if this is done we still do not have a universal service at a rate that will move the produce of the country. The present express rates are now prohibitive in the movement of many classes of products between cities, and the same conditions would remain even if they were ever allowed to use rural carriers to extend their service.

ADVANTAGES OF GOVERNMENT EXPRESS.

The advantage of a parcel express where merchandise is moved at cost or a small profit, with a rate based on weight and distance, is fair to all. It does not give the advantage to large centers, thus concentrating the business of the country in a few hands, but it does give a cheap rate of transportation. with facilities so easy of access to all the people that quick distribution of products must follow. The man living 10 miles from the railroad is almost as well off as the man who lives within a few blocks of the station, as the parcel-express van will call at his door daily, or triweekly, or semiweekly, as the demand requires. The result of this system of quick and universal transportation will be to reduce the cost of living very greatly and for many reasons. One is, it will place in the hands of the consumer vast quantities of products that now go to waste on the farms of the country. Another will be the cheapening of the products as a result cheapening of the cost of transportation and increasing the actual amount of available Another will be the stimulation of production due to the facility for marketing it.

As an example of waste of the products of the farm for want of easy and quick distribution: Last fall I saw thousands of bushels of apples rotting in the orchards in eastern Nebraska for of a cheap and easy method of transportation. These orchards were within 50 miles of a city of 150,000 people, where apples were selling to the consumer for 40 cents a peck, and we still wonder at the high cost of living. If those farmers had undertaken to reach that market, this is what would have happened to them: First, barrels or boxes would have to be procured, apples packed, corn husking stopped, team taken from the field, and long trip taken to town with the shipment. The local merchant would then take the shipment and consign it to a commission man in Omaha, and the commission man would sell it in turn to a retailer, and the retailer delivers it to the consumer. Forty cents a peck does not seem a very high price to the three middle men and cared for it 10 years before it was old enough to bear fruit the amount left looked discouraging indeed. Maybe in the end the farmer would get 10 cents, and may be he would get a bill for the loss sustained in the shipment. I have known several instances where actual losses have been sustained on shipments of this kind. After a few experiences the farmer settles down to corn and hogs and lets the other products of his farm go to waste rather than to waste his time trying to get them to the consumer.

As a further example of the present condition of the producer, a man in southeastern Nebraska consigned a car of apples to Omaha, and in the course of a day or so he got a letter requesting a draft to cover a part of the freight charges and commission, as the apples did not sell for enough to cover expenses. The producer wired back that he did not have any money, but he could send another car of apples. [Laughter.]

VALUE OF MIDDLE MAN.

I do not wish to be understood as attacking the usefulness of a middle man. There are places in commerce where he is most useful and important in the distribution of merchandise. fact, the country could no more do without him than it can without the railroads. But it is not reasonable to expect the producer to pay four profits on the passage of a peck of apples from his orchard to the consumer. Such a condition is simply and absolute waste, and no one can defend it. Let the farmer have a chance to consign his products direct to one middle man or to the consumer, as is the best for him. A middle man who serves no useful purpose has no claim to exist. If he can not serve profitably, he should become a producer. The middle man who makes himself useful to society is the one who gathers up the products that are not in touch with a natural market and distributes where needed—is a most useful adjunct to trade. No middle man who serves a useful purpose need have fear of his trade disappearing. It is not according to the law of trade.

A COMPARISON OF TRANSPORTATION-YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY,

Our present facilities for transportation are splendid compared to those of 25 years ago, and we only need to look back to realize what a great future we are now contemplating, and this high cost of living is bringing us closer to the realization of it. I am a comparatively young man yet, but I was a voter before we quit burning corn in Nebraska for fuel. Think of it, this wonderful food product, King Corn, the staff of life, we burned to keep us from freezing, not in times of stress, but quite regularly, because it was the cheapest thing we had to Over here on this side of the Mississippi the people who mined the coal were warm enough, but hungry for our corn, and we were not hungry, but chilled to the bone for want of their coal.

And all this time the great Union Pacific Railroad trains passed our doors daily, to the construction of which the National Government had donated millions of acres of our public domain and millions in money, but its rates were so extortionate that the products of the farm would not sell for enough to pay the freight to those who needed them. The case is not so bad to-day. The railroads have learned that rates can be so high as to kill business, and the people have learned also that they can in a measure control common carriers. result of this experience has taught the railroads that by making a low rate they can create business, so to-day the trains coming out of Nebraska are loaded down with corn, wheat, and cattle from our farms, and the trains going in are loaded with coal, lumber, and merchandise. They still charge every dollar the traffic will bear and yet move, but they watch the rate barometer closely.

PARCEL EXPRESS WILL DOUBLE VOLUME OF BUSINESS.

It is not claimed for the parcel express that it will in a way affect the movement of staples such as the heavy products of the farm, but it is claimed that the Government with a free field can through the parcel express reduce the present express rates at least one-half and give a universal service wherever mail is delivered.

Cutting the express rates in two means a doubling of the business at least once, and in doubling the business the cost of living must necessarily be reduced. The cost of living depends as much upon the means of distribution as it does upon production.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I was told before Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I was told before noon that they have a commission for the control of express companies in Canada, and that last fall they cut the express rate in half and that the express companies there are not objecting. They are doing more business under that than before. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. No, I do not; but I think it is very probable.

Nothing could be more absurd than the present system of sending out an able-bodied man with a team and wagon over a mail route for the purpose of delivering possibly an average of 100 letters a day, and with strict orders from the Government not to be useful to the patrons he serves in any other manner than in the delivery of mail.

It does not require a very vivid imagination to conceive of all these dinky mail wagons being exchanged for auto trucks, covering twice the length of routes and doing a package-express business in connection with the mail delivery, thus rendering a real service to the country. It is apparent the authors of the good-road feature of this bill foresaw the coming of this method of rural transportation and have anticipated the needs of the country for better wagon roads.

UNIVERSAL EXPRESS SERVICE BEGINS NEW ERA:

This system of Government parcel express in connection with the mail delivery will be the beginning of a new era of prosperity in this country. The difference between the new era perity in this country. The difference between the new era and the one passing will be that the mass of the people will share some of the prosperity as well as those who trade and traffic in the products of the producers. In the decade closing the increase in the commerce of the Nation has been beyond human conception, yet the accumulated wealth of this period has not been left in the hands of those who produced it. Those who handle the Nation's products know exactly how much money they have paid the consumer and, therefore, how much the consumer can pay for the products of labor, so they fix the price at what the traffic will bear, take out all they can, and leave the man who produces the products just enough to coax him on and keep him producing. It is a great game, and it will be a long time yet before the producers of wealth will be able to protect themselves from those who live by exploiting them.

Another result of the establishing of a universal parcel express through the Post Office Department that would be farreaching and of national importance would be the encouragement of the "back-to-the-farm" movement. This drift from the farm to the city is an actual menace to the peace and welfare of the Republic. With universal express the man of the farm as well as the country merchant is placed in close communication with the commerce of the Nation. He is no longer outside of it, but a part of it, and the products of his toil are easily accessible to those who consume them or to the merchant who deals in them.

SMALL TOWN MERCHANT WILL FAVOR PARCEL EXPRESS.

In this connection I have not given much attention to the effect on the small towns of the passage of this proposed Gocke bill. The reason I have not is because their prosperity is entirely wrapped up in the prosperity of the farmer. The country merchant ought to welcome this law with open arms. It means a cut of at least one-half in his express account. It means that his customers on the farm will sell probably twice as much produce as formerly, and therefore have twice as much money to spend as they now have. It means cheaper produce to the consumer because of the cheaper and quicker means of transportation. The merchant can not and will not oppose this measure, but he would be perfectly right in opposing a flat rate parcel post that would rob the Government on the one hand and put it in the pockets of the mail-order houses on the other. Let the merchant, farmer, and mail-order house pay just what it is worth for the transportation of merchandise. There is no justification for a rate that is not fair to every one.

OPPOSITION MEANS STEP BACKWARD.

To oppose the perfecting of our system of quick and easy transportation is to stand in the way of progress. One might as well try to sweep back the tides of the sea. It would be as reasonable to take away our present crude system of communication and transportation and lapse again into barbarism as it is to try to prevent its complete development, so that every part of the country will be in close relationship through a perfect system of distribution.

GOVERNMENT AID TO POST ROADS.

The Shackleford bill providing that the Government shall pay for a part of the upkeep of the public roads over which rural mail routes are laid is perfectly practicable, and if enacted into law will be a great encouragement to local and State authorities in the construction of good roads, as I shall undertake to show in these remarks.

Some of our good friends are greatly shocked at the idea of Government aid to post roads, as provided for in this bill. They evidently have not thought of the exact parallel we have in the payment annually by the National Government of some $50,000,000 of compensation to the railroads for the use of the Post Office Department in transporting the mails. The railroad company furnishes a railroad and the Government pays $50,-The railroad 000,000 rent for using it. The counties and States of the Union furnish 1,000,000 miles of wagon road over which the Government transports the same mails, and the Government pays not one cent toward it. By what law of logic can one justify compensating a mail route that lies over steel rails and refuse compensation to the mail routes that lie over the wagon roads of the country?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Nebraska 10 minutes more.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, how much annually does the Government pay to the rural carriers for delivering the mails over the roads to which he refers?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. The Government pays $1,000 a year to the rural carrier for the service of delivering the mail to the rural-route patrons, and this carrier furnishes his own horses and wagons and pays for all of the upkeep, and in the gentleman's city the Government pays $1,200 to the mail carriers who do the same service, who do not have to pay any of these expenses.

Mr. MADDEN. Is not the wagon service to which the gentleman refers equivalent to the railroad service?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. The carrier himself furnishes the wagon.

Mr. MADDEN. The railway furnishes the car.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. But the Government pays for the car.

Mr. MADDEN. The Government pays for the wagon the carrier furnishes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. It does not. The carrier himself furnishes his own wagon, and he furnishes as a rule four horses and their harness and feed and the upkeep of the wagon, and he gets $200 less a year than the carrier in the city.

But if there were technical objections they should be removed for the sake of the splendid results in national development that is sure to follow this policy. The passage of the parcel express measure will make it necessary to improve the post roads over which this new volume of business must be moved. Many post roads are now totally unfit for quick and economical express service.

WOULD ENCOURAGE LOCAL AUTHORITIES.

It has been argued by some Members in this House that national aid to these post roads would be the signal for the local authorities to stop all efforts to improve the roads, leaving the work entirely to the Government. Gentlemen who make this plea are undoubtedly not familiar with the experience of the country on this subject. Wherever States have given aid to counties in the construction of roads it has doubled and quadrupled local road interest, encouraging counties and towns to raise large sums of money to further the work. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson] in a speech before the Senate on this subject stated that as a result of the State appropriating $250,000 for aid to counties in road building, the counties of the State were led to raise $3,000,000 for road purposes. This has been a universal experience and bears out the belief that national aid to post roads will have a similar effect.

This would not be true if the Government took over the roads

This would not be true if the Government took over the roads and supervised their construction and maintenance. But this bill wisely contemplates leaving the post roads in the hands of local authorities. This leaves the Postmaster General free to pass upon the kind of roads that local authorities maintain, and if the roads are not up to requirements national aid will be withheld. With a club like that nothing but neglect and indifference on the part of the Postmaster General could prevent post roads from being the best in the country.

GOVERNMENT HAS AIDED OTHER INDUSTRIES.

And where and how could the National Government render the public a greater service than in this proposed aid to post roads? Rural routes. Forty million people live along these highways, and they pay, at least, one-half of the taxes collected by the Government.

For more than a hundred years the Government has given aid to transportation lines on land and water. It has given 200,000,000 acres of the public domain to the railroads of this country and millions in money. It has given untold millions to dredging streams and building harbors for the water commerce of the country. It has spent countless millions for public buildings in the various large cities of the country. It has, through a protective tariff, established a protection to the manufacturing business of the country, legally enabling it to force a tribute from other industries. The Government has done all these things in the interest of two great industries—transportation and manufacturing—but it has proportionately done little for the greatest industry of them all, agriculture; but agriculture bears on its broad shoulders the other two dependent industries of which we have been so considerate.

EXAMPLES OF WASTE ON RIVERS

Now, when we come down to the proposition of spending a few of these millions among the people who have paid one-half of the taxes of the country, and who have had little direct benefit from the expenditure of these taxes, we have Members of this House expressing great surprise at the proposition, ignoring the fact that the proposed aid to post roads is not a drop in the bucket to the amounts that are paid out annually for much less meritorious projects. As an example, every year this Government pays out many thousand dollars for running a snag boat up and down the grand old Missouri River, around two sides of my district, lest the great commerce of that shifting stream of sand might be tied up on a cottonwood stump. I have not been able to find a man in my district whose residence dates back far enough to remember when that snag boat began operations, nor is there a man in that country so ignorant as to not appreciate the stupidity of such an expenditure. In 1910 the snag-boat flotilla moved up and down the Missouri from Kausas City to Fort Benton, Mont., a distance of 1,893 miles, and pulled from the river 881 snags. One of my constituents informs me that he saw the snagger pull the same stump three times, each time elepositing it on a shifting sand bar to wash away again. Every two or three miles the snagger pulls a stump and thus figura-tively saves some mighty craft of commerce that is supposed to ply between Kausas City and Fort Benton, Mont., from a sandy, stumpy grave. The money wasted in this manner would go a long way toward protecting its banks, or building post roads in Nebraska and the adjoining States.

Not only has the Government given aid to actual commerce on our navigable rivers, but it has squandered millions on streams that have no commerce, never did have, and no one expects they ever will have, all of which ought to be sufficient precedent for Government aid to the commerce that moves over the wagon roads of this country. It is not consistent to vote public funds for the aid of railroad and river commerce and refuse it to post roads, where another great economy can be practiced.

BAD ROADS A TAX ON COUNTRY.

This country pays every year approximately two and one-half billion dollars for wagon freight. The sum is a tremendous tax upon our resources, because of the lamentable conditions of our roads. In France where the Government builds and maintains all the main wagon roads of the country the wagon freight is moved for less than half what it costs in this country. If we could improve our highways so that the present load could be doubled we would save in wagon freight in this country annually about one and one-quarter billion dollars, or enough to build three Panama Canals and leave a balance. while this enormous saving is perfectly feasible and has been actually realized by other nations, we go on complacently voting millions for the improvement of the navigation on Lost Creek and for public building at Sundance and other equally unimportant places where the Government could hire the service for one-fourth the interest on the invest-There is not a locality in the United States, outside of the large cities, that would not infinitely prefer national aid to post roads than to have public buildings erected in a favored towns. I do not oppose the erection of public buildings where it is an economy to do so, but what I oppose is the extravagant waste of money for this purpose when we need it so badly where it would earn large returns on the investment, as would be the case when invested in good roads. The Government could take the money invested in two post offices in my district and build post offices in 10 towns that would be in keeping with the buildings in those towns, and if it turned the money over to the towns themselves, to be expended under Government supervision, the people would get 25 per cent more for their money than they now get, as fully half of the publicbuilding appropriation is spent in overhead charges.

TAX FOR ROADS NOT A TAX AT ALL, BUT AN INVESTMENT.

The tax levied for the maintenance of the courts, Army and Navy, et cetera, is a burden on the producer and no material results can come back to the people as a result of these expenditures. This money is gone forever. It is a clean waste, but the tax levied for good roads is not a tax at all, but an investment which pays back to the people an enormous dividend. This is exampled by a statement made by Gov. Swanson, of Virginia, now in the United States Senate, in which, after calling attention to the millions spent by that State in the last few years for good roads, says:

What is still more striking in this matter is that the expenses incurred by the State for education and roads more than paid for themselves in the increased revenue derived by the State on account of the increased prosperity and advance of values without any increase of taxes whatever The revenue of Virginia for the years 1908 and 1909 increased over the revenue of the two previous years more than $916,000, although these years immediately followed the panic of 1907.

FEDERAL AID ENCOURAGES STATES AND COUNTIES.

I think it safe to say that there is not an instance where counties and States have made road improvements that the valuation of property has not increased sufficiently to raise sufficient funds to pay for this improvement without increasing the tax rate. In other words, the building of good roads produces wealth instead of being a burden of expense to the people. The object of Federal aid for this purpose is not so much for the purpose of raising funds to build roads in the States as it is for the purpose of encouraging the States to enter upon this work of improving their highways.

Senator Swanson, in his speech before the Senate on this same subject, showed how States aid through the work of convicts on the road, and the sum appropriated, of $250,000, was the means of encouraging the counties to raise approximately $3,000,000 in a very short space of time for the purpose of improving the roads of the various counties of the State. These counties were induced to raise this large sum of money in order to receive State aid, and the amount of money they received from the State equaled the amount they would raise themselves. The Senator also stated that educational facilities would improve with road conditions. Under the operation of this principle of State aid the high schools were increased from 74 to 405. More than half of the magisterial districts of the State rapidly acquired high schools. Think of it. In the whole State of Virginia only 74 high schools had been established in rural districts up to two or three years ago, when the State appropriated $100,000 for their encouragement, and in the state appropriate $100,000 for their encouragement, and in the short space of two or three years these high schools increased from 74 to 405. This is the best evidence that could possibly be produced showing that Federal aid to States would encourage States to take up the question of improving the highways of the States through the cooperation of the counties.

FARMER HAS NOT PRESSED HIS CLAIM.

The three great industries of our business life are agriculture, transportation, and manufacturing. Of these three agriculture is the basic industry, the other two being dependent upon it for their very existence. Agriculture fills the storehouse of the Nation; upon it and its allied industries depend the very life of our records. the very life of our people. A poor crop forecasted and all the other industries languish; a bountiful crop and the wheels of industry hum. In fact, every material prosperity in every walk of life rests upon this great industry of agriculture; not only is the prosperity of the Nation dependent upon it, but it also bears directly and indirectly a great proportion of taxes levied by the Nation. The agricultural interests have had little Government consideration as compared to the other two great industries-transportation and manufacturing-due to the isolated condition of the farmer. He has not pressed his claim at Washington as vigorously as have the other two. These industries—manufacturing and transportation—have been in the hands of shrewd business men, who have been able to force from the hands of the Government aid which has made them prosper beyond similar industries anywhere in the whole world, and they have prospered in a great measure at the expense of agriculture.

If the objection to Government aid to roads arises from the belief that the local authorities might not use the money intelligently and economically for the benefit of the roads, they only need to turn to the millions of money spent on the rivers and harbors of the country and compare the results with those obtained by the common wagon-road officials with the comparative of the country and compared to the coun tively small sums at their disposals.

We have no road officials in Nebraska so ignorant or indifferent to the public need as to spend fifteen or twenty thousand dollars a year running a snag boat up and down a river that has no commerce, nor ever will have, but they would instead take that money and protect the banks of the stream with it. Or if that money and protect the banks of the stream with it. Or if there are still others who think we have no precedent for such an expenditure let them read the history of the national pike built by the Government. Let them go to Panama, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands and ride over the spiendid stone roads built by the Government for a barefoot, semibarbaric people. We have no such roads in this country outside of the influence of our largest cities.

Why should the Government build stone roads in our foreign possessions and refuse to pay a reasonable compensation for the upkeep of the post roads of the people of the United States the upkeep of the post roads of the people of the United States who pay the taxes? It costs money to build railroads, and the Government recognizes the fact by compensating them for service in transporting the mails. The States and counties build wagon roads, and they, too, cost money, and why should not the Government compensate them by returning a portion of the tax they pay to the National Government to be used in the maintenance of post roads?

FARMERS FOR FEDERAL AID.

The agricultural interests of this country are clamorous for Federal aid for the construction of public roads and they do so upon the ground that the people in the end must pay the extra cost of transporting the foodstuff of the world from the farms to the railroads, and that this tax aggregates two and one-half billion dollars a year. This sum is a tax upon the products of the soil and must be borne by all the people. Federal aid for wagon roads is sometimes opposed on the ground that the road has only a local importance and the benefit would accrue only for the landowners along such roads, while all the people would be taxed. Such arguments can not be defended. If they could be defended, we could not build courthouses or schools or improve our rivers for the reason that only a few would use the courthouses, or a fraction would receive any benefit from the rivers, and only a portion of the people have children to educate. Of the same character is the objection that Government aid to roads would have only a local benefit in increasing property values at the expense of all the people. The same argument would hold against the bonus of 200,000,000 acres of public lands to encourage the construction of railroads, as only the immediate country through which the road passed would be Yet this aid given the railroads opened up the West benefited. and developed it a hundred years in advance of the same development without them, and as a result billions of indirect tax has been paid to the National Government in return for the outlay in encouraging the construction of railroads.

Therefore I am convinced that while there has been great waste wherever the Government has attempted to aid in the development of the country, yet the results for good have been infinitely greater than the losses sustained. The importance of connecting the farm up with the commercial world is apparent in the decay of agriculture east of the Appalachian Mountains. It is only a question of years until this decay will eat into the West, the storehouse of the Nation. Bad roads lead directly to national decay as certain as death itself. Tenant farming has been the curse of Ireland for 300 years, and that day is coming in this country if this great industry is not given an opportunity to live. Covernment all to year reads in convention with the to live. Government aid to post roads in connection with the parcel express will be a great step in the right direction. I sincerely hope that both these measures will become laws.

It is unnecessary for us to call your attention to the benefits to be derived by the railway employees in the United States from the passage of this bill, and we ask you as a friend of the workingmen not only to vote for same but to use your utmost endeavors to have this bill passed.

Thanking you in advance for whatever assistance you may be able to render in the above matter, we remain, in the Record, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States of America,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned citizens of the United States of America and State of California, do hereby vigorously and emphatically protest against the passage of Senate bill No. 1 (introduced by Senator Owen), providing for the establishment of a national bureau of health; Senate bill No. 5972 (introduced by Senator Smoot), increasing the functions of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service; or other similar medical legislation, for the following reasons:

(1) It would mean Government exploitation of the regular school of medicine (the school which has always controlled the medical affairs of the United States Government) in discrimination against all other schools of healing, giving enlarged Government sanction to an already created medical trust, and would be class legislation of the most pernicious character.

(2) Such proposed legislation would be used by the American Medical Association as an entering wedge to the establishing of state medicine, which would be as obnoxious to American citizens as state religion.

cal Association as an entropy and call association as an entropy and call association as an entropy and call association. (3) It is unnecessary legislation. The present medical activities of the Government, combined with the highly efficient service rendered by State boards of health, are ample to cope with all demands made upon them. Further legislation would be useless and would involve a needless expenditure of public moneys. (Said Prof. Irving Fisher, in a plea for a national department of health, "It is a project which once started will surely expand within a decade so that millions upon millions of Government money will be put into this most-needed form of national defense.")

(4) It would mean Federal interference with the rights of the States in their conduct of their internal health affairs.

(5) In the dissemination of information authorized by such legislation the country would be flooded at the taxpayers' expense with literature concerning the ever-changing fads and fancies of the allopathic school of medicine.

(6) It would furnish thousands of permanent Government jobs for graduates of the regular school of medicine who at present are unable to compete with the rapidly increasing popularity of the independent schools of medicine and systems of healing.

Mr. WORKS. I have a number of telegrams in the nature of memorials remonstrating against the Owen medical bill. ask that the telegrams lie on the table and be printed in the

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Los Angeles, Cal., April 19, 1912.

Hon. John D. Works. Washington, D. C .:

Washington, D. C.:

I hope you will do all in your power to aid in defeating the Owen bill, Senate bill No. 1. I consider it a bad measure. It will open the way to a further extension of the power of the allopathic doctors already controlling the health activity of the United States Government. The wide circulation of bulletins which the bill authorizes would undoubtedly result in forcing upon the people, whether willing or not, masses of literature favoring allopathy methods and theories to the exclusion of all others. Competition and an open field for investigation and research is as essential in medicine as it is in industries and business. It is as important to preserve the medical freedom of the American people as it is their political and religious freedom.

Edwin T. Earl. EDWIN T. EARL.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 19, 1912.

Hon. John D. Works,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I learn that Owen bill, providing for bureau of health, has been favorably reported out of committee, and I want to place myself on record as emphatically opposing it. Hope you will assist in preventing its passage. Those of us who have studied the political activities of the American Medical Association see in this measure a directed effort to enact discriminatory allopathic medical legislation interfering with freedom of individuals in selecting homeopathy or some other method. It is class legislation and not a popular measure.

W. J. HAWKES, M. D., Vice President California State Homeopathic Society.

Los Angeles, Cal., April 20, 1912.

Hon. J. D. Works, Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Owen bill would permit of further Federal discrimination against in-dependent schools of medicine and methods of healing. Present monopoly of allopathic school in the United States Government should be abol-ished instead of giving further approval to present discrimination. Owen bill is a bad measure; am glad you have taken a stand-against it. Mrs. R. L. Craig.

Los Angeles, Cal., April 20, 1912.

Hon. John D. Works, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Believe such legislation as proposed Owen bill unnecessary; can not see where it will render present medical activities of the Government more efficient. Deem it needless expenditure of people's money.

MARCO H. HELLMAN.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL., April 19, 1912.

Hon. John D. Works,

Scrate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

I emphatically protest against State medicine exemplified by Owen bill under control of the old school, which has always been essentially unfair, intolerant, and arbitrary as against any other school of medicine attested by my 33 years' experience as homeopathic physician and intimate acquaintance with many medical men.

HENRY L. STAMBACH, M. D.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 19, 1912.

Hon. John D. Works, United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Your stand opposing Senate bill No. 1 meets my hearty approval. The legislation proposed is not necessary; in its effect it will be class and discriminatory statute violating constitutional principles. Result will place health and physical well-being of people in hands of interested school of medicine in practical partnership with Federal Government; hope it will not pass.

LESLIE R. HEWITT.

SAFETY OF LIFE AT SEA.

Mr. ASHURST introduced a bill (S. 6481) to require steamships and steam vessels leaving ports of the United States to provide adequate life-saving apparatus and safeguards against accidents, which was read twice by its title and, with accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ASHURST. I have a letter from a distinguished citizen of Arizona which contains an argument in support of the bill I have just introduced. It is a bill calculated to curb the speed of vessels operated by steamship companies. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FLAGSTAFF, ARIZ., April 18, 1912.

Hon. Henry F. Ashurst,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

My Dean Saxvivor: The appalling disaster visited upon the civilized world than it was of the Thomio brings very vividly before my mind a thought it was of the Thomio brings very vividly before my mind a thought it was of the Thomio brings very vividly before my mind a thought it was of the Thomio brings very vividly before my mind a thought it was of the Thomio brings very vividly before my mind a thought it was of the Thomio brings very vividly before my mind a thought it was not a state of the harbor, of a German freight steamer which had just pulled into the harbor enveloped in flames. The burning ship was surrounded before we passed out of view by a number, of boats, the crews of which were pouring floods of water on the burning ship. I have no doubt but that the flames were extinguished and that no great damage was done.

Which I was a passenger, and I romember distinctly presenting the question as to what would happen to us should a serious fire break out on our steamer in mid-ocean or should some other serious accident take place. It was evident that our only recourse would be the life-boats and life rafts on board; and that these would have to avail until chance steamers should pick us up. Two or three of us then decided to find out just what provision was made on the steamer for taking care of human life in such an emergency. We counted up all the lifeboats and life rafts provided by the boat and then computed the number of passed in the state of the sta

I appeal to you now as being in a position to remedy this terrible state of affairs, or, at least, to put yourself and your friends on record as having no part, at least in the future, in any such unnecessary and terrible sacrifices of human life. A law should be passed, made by the Congress of the United States, forbidding the port officers of any American port to permit any vessel, whatever flag it might fly, to leave any American port without having lifeboat provisions for every passenger that it carries, and, in addition to this, surplus lifeboat capacity of at least 10 per cent more than its passenger capacity in order to provide for emergencies.

I realize perfectly well that it would be useless to attempt to prescribe rules for incoming vessels flying foreign flags, but the United States Congress can prescribe such rules for outgoing vessels, whatever may be the flag under which they are sailing. Of course a suggestion of such a bill would produce a howl from every steamship company on both sides of the Atlantic. It would be immediately shown that such a measure was impossible of execution; that the load would reduce the weight-carrying capacity beyond the point of profit; that the additional friction would make it impracticable, and a host of such other reasons, always obscuring the one essential point—that human life must be protected.

Much has been done through legislation to protect human life on railroads. The same and more can be done, if it is gone after, for the protection of human life at sea.

I sincerely hope that you will give the weight of your influence to the introduction and passage of such a law, and that you will not be diverted from it by any of the bogles that the steamship interests may present, brushing everything aside except the one luminous fact that human life must be preserved.

We as a Nation have been taught a great lesson by this disaster. It has taken some of the flower of our people and has entered intimately even into the very household of our President. I think that the

In the hope that you may be able to accomplish something on this,

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. GARDNER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with the findings of Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAGE submitted an amendment relative to experiments in breeding horses for military purposes, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agriculture appropriation bill (H. R. 18960), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. DU PONT submitted an amendment relative to the improvement of the inland waterway between Rehoboth Bay and Delaware Bay, Del., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 21477), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

SUPPORT OF AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. BRADLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3) to cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades, and industries and home economics in secondary schools; in maintaining instruction in these vocational subjects in State normal schools: in maintaining extension departments in State colleges of agriculture and mechanic arts; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE (S. DOC. NO. 601).

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the hearings had before the joint committee of the Committee on the Judiciary and Committee on Woman Suffrage, United States Senate, Sixty-second Congress, second session, upon woman suffrage, be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection an order therefor will be entered.

LANDS AND WATERS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 22642) providing for the protection of the interests of the United States in lands and waters comprising any part of the Potomac River, the Anacostia River or Eastern Branch, and Rock Creek and lands adjacent thereto.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this bill was presented to the Senate a few days ago, and I called attention to the fact that there is on the calendar a bill in substantially the same language as this bill. For that reason I asked consent to have the House bill considered. It was read, but I was then informed that the Department of Justice might want to have it somewhat amended. For that reason I had it laid aside. Department of Justice has reported that it has concluded that the bill is in proper form. I now ask for its consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senate bill 1898 of like title, now on the calendar, will be taken from the calendar and action thereon indefinitely postponed.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, something like a week ago I gave notice to the Senate of the fact that the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House joint resolution No. 39, providing for the direct election of Senators by the people, had been unable to agree, stating at that time that because of the great public interest apparent in this question, and in order that all Senators might have due notice, the formal presentation of the disagreement would be postponed until this morning. It is now my purpose, Mr. President, to present that formal disagreement, prefacing it, however, with a statement that the members of the committee of conference of both the Houses have been diligent in their efforts to reach an agreement on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. The committee has had no less than 16 joint meetings, at all of which a majority of the committee from both Houses have been present. Notwithstanding their efforts, the fact of disagreement still remains. I think it is due to the Senate to make a short statement as to the disagreement.

Owing to the fact that there seems to be a misunderstanding in some quarters as to the purport of the proposed amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by the people, it might be well if the actual situation were concisely stated, so that there can be no question as to the attitude of Members of the Senate in relation thereto.

For many years there has been a growing belief in the United States that the Senators of the United States should be elected, as are the Representatives, by direct vote of the people, and that the duty of choosing Senators should not be performed by mem-bers of legislatures. This has been largely brought about by the fact that in some States regrettable scandals have attended the election and by the belief that large sums of money have been habitually used, either directly or indirectly, in procuring elections by the legislatures, and it has been thought that by giv-ing the election directly into the hands of the people these scandals and practices would be avoided, or at least minimized. The full scope and extent of the desire of the people, so far as it has found expression, has been that the vote for Senators should be taken directly to the people, and the demand has been made that the Constitution be amended so as to procure this very clear and definite result.

There is at present a difference of opinion between the Senate and the House as to the exact form which this resolution for an amendment should assume. The House of Representatives passed a form of resolution providing not only for the amendment that should take the election direct to the people by an amendment to section 3 of Article I of the Constitution, but also proposed an amendment to section 4, Article I, which section gives to Congress supervisory authority over the regulations prescribed in each State as to the manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives.

In passing this resolution the House seeks not only to provide for the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people, but also seeks to strip the Congress of the United States of any authority to supervise, in any manner or degree, the election of Senators, notwithstanding the fact that the proposed amendment of the House still leaves this power intact so far as election of Members of the House of Representatives is concerned. The Senate amendment, on the other hand, provides simply and solely for the election of the Senators by the people, leaving the supervisory authority of Congress over the election, both of Senators and Representatives chosen by the same electorate, in exactly the same condition as it now is in the Constitution. In other words, the House provides for two amendments to the Constitution—the Senate provides for one only.

In the opinion of many of the best constitutional authorities, the amendment of the House would absolutely leave the Congress of the United States helpless to make inquiry into the election of a Senator in any manner whatever. The last Congress passed a publicity bill in which the amount that might be expended by or for a candidate for the Senate of the United States was expressly limited to a sum definite and certain. It would seem possible that under the proposed amendment as presented by the House no bill of that sort could be passed, and Congress would have no authority either to inquire into or to limit the amount of money that might be expended in such an election. Certainly there are few who would contend that such a condition ought to exist. To deprive the Congress of the United States of the power to say whether or not a Member of either body of its Congress had been corruptly elected is striking at the very root of the legislative branch of our Government.

Now, Mr. President, I report the inability of the conferees to agree, return the conference papers to the Senate, and move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendment to House joint resolution No. 39.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming presents the report of the committee of conference on the disagree-ing votes of the two Houses on House joint resolution No. 39, and moves that the Senate further insist upon its amendment to the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am one of the Senators delegated by this body to represent it upon the conference committee, and I have, I think, been assiduous in my attention to the duties assigned to me and diligent in the effort to try to bring about some arrangement between the two Houses. The paper, as I understand, which has just been read by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Clark] is a report from that committee. Am I correct?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It was not so intended. Mr. BACON. Well, if it was not so intended, of course I have no right to see it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator is perfectly welcome to see it.

Mr. BACON. I understand that.
Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator knows very well what the action of the committee was—that a report of the disagreement should be reported back to the Senate. I suppose there was nothing in that to preclude a Member of the Senate presenting the report setting forth in his own language his own views as to the differences between the two Houses.

Mr. BACON. Probably if the Senator would retain his patience a little while, until I get through, he would not find it necessary to make the remarks he has just uttered.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Georgia was looking toward me with an inquiring eye.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply rose to say that if what the Senator read was not intended as a report, of course I had no ground for complaint in the fact that it was not submitted to me or that I had not an opportunity to see it. If it contained simply the personal remarks of the Senator, I have no more right to be admitted into his confidence as to what those remarks would be upon that subject than I have on any other Consequently the Senator is above criticism in that subject. regard.

I did wish to say, Mr. President, that on that committee, of course, I represented, as everyone knows, the minority and the views of the minority. Under the rules of the conference committee the committee necessarily acts as a unit, and Senators standing for the Senate proposition necessarily, under the action of the majority, represent the unit. At the same time it is proper that I should say that the paper just read, which I understood at the time of the reading to be a report—of course, I take the statement of the Senator from Wyoming that it is not so intended—has the effect of a report, and I would respectfully ask that I have the opportunity to file the views which I, as a member of that committee, entertain as to the action of the committee and what I think should be the action now.

I want to say, however, in regard to one part of the paper just read, which bears a very striking resemblance to some things which have been uttered in the other House on the same subject, that I had intended, Mr. President, if the opportunity were presented, to offer an amendment to the joint resolution as it came from the Judiciary Committee, which would have probably met one of the objections which have been put forward not read this now, except, of course, for information. I recognot read this now, except, of course, for information. nize the fact spoken of by the Senator that the recent legislation with regard to publicity might not be enforced if the resolution were adopted as it came from the other House and as it was reported to the Senate. Therefore, with the concurrence of such Senators as I have had the opportunity to confer with-I have had this but a few moments-I had intended, as I have already said, if the opportunity should be presented, to move to add this as an amendment to the joint resolution as it came from the Judiciary Committee and as it came from the other House, the joint resolution as it came from the House being the joint resolution reported from the Judiciary Commit-The amendment which I will offer, if the opportunity presents itself, is this: After reciting the joint resolution just as it was reported from the Judiciary Committee, add these words:

But Congress may make such regulations in any State whenever the legislature thereof shall neglect, refuse, or from any circumstance shall be incapable of doing so, and Congress may limit expenditures—

This is the part to which I call particular attentionand Congress may limit expenditures and require publicity in connection with the nomination and election of Senators.

So that there will be no issue between the learned Senator and myself and those with whom I am in accord in regard to the advisability and propriety and importance of having this joint resolution so framed as to guard that particular point.

Now, I should like very much, Mr. President, as the paper which has been read by the Senator is presented, it is true, not formally as a report, but necessarily with the force and effect of a report, that I may have the opportunity to file a paper expressing the views of myself, representing the minority, in regard to this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, such permission is granted.

Mr. BACON. I would not have the opportunity if the motion made by the Senator is now to be acted upon, and it was with that in view that I made the request.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Well, Mr. President, a week ago the notice was given so that all Senators might be prepared to take up this subject and act upon it at this time. As stated before, the presentation of the disagreement was delayed for six or seven or eight days in order that all who are interested might have due notice and be prepared to take up this matter at this time. Unfortunately, departing from my usual custom, in order that I might not be inaccurate, I reduced my remarks upon this question to writing. They are in no sense a part of the report; they are in no sense a part of the record, except as they are made a part of the record by being spoken upon the floor of the Senate. They purport to have no other or further authority or weight than the authority and weight of the upon the floor. Mr. President, in view of all the circumstances and in view of the importance of this question which has been long lying in the committee-and I want to say without the fault of any member of the committee—it seems to me that, with the notice given, this matter ought to be taken up at this time and some word of mouth upon any proposition coming from any Senator disposition made of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. SUTHERLAND addressed the Chair. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah desires to speak, I will yield to him. I was simply going to call for a quorum in order that there may be no one absent. for a quorum in order that there may be no one absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator does not raise that question now

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Utah desires to speak.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest, then, the absence of a quorum.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.
The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Curtis	McCumber	Sanders
Bacon	Davis	McLean	Shively
Borah	Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bourne	du Pont	Myers	Smith, Ariz.

Culberson	Lippitt	Richardson	Williams
Challon	Yadaa	Dont	Woulen

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent on the business of the Senate. I should like to have this statement stand for the day.

Mr. BRYAN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-two Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BORAH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is a motion to recede from the Senate amendment and to concur in the House joint resolution in order at this time by way of amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to insist is practically the reverse of a motion to recede, and the motion to insist has been made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that after a matter has gone to conference any motion which brings the two Houses into accord has preference of a motion that keeps them apart.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ordinarily that would be correct. Mr. WILLIAMS. A motion to recede and concur has the preference over a motion to insist.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No motion to recede and concur has been made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood that was the motion made by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The thought has occurred to me that I want some further parliamentary information. I presume that a motion to recede and concur in the House joint resolution would necessitate a two-thirds vote in order to concur.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks there is no doubt about that.

Mr. BORAH. Then I will not make the motion.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. BACON. Before that motion is put, I want to repeat what I stated a few moments ago, and I hope Senators may be able to understand exactly what I intend in this and the full signification of what the amendment will import, if it should be adopted. If the motion to insist is defeated and the question then will be upon concurring in the House joint resolution, I will offer the following amendment:

But Congress may make such regulations in any State whenever the legislature thereof shall neglect, refuse, or, from any circumstance, shall be incapable of doing so, and Congress may limit expenditures and require publicity in connection with the nomination and election of Senators.

I do not intend, Mr. President, to consume the time of the Senate. I have already addressed it several times upon this I want to call attention simply to two things. The first part of the proposed amendment which I have read and which I now read again is as follows:

But Congress may make such regulations in any State whenever the legislature thereof shall neglect, refuse, or, from any circumstance, shall be incapable of doing so.

That sentence is copied almost verbatim from the resolution of the convention of the State of New York at the time it gave its assent to the Constitution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah? Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator read that last sentence again? I did not quite catch it.

Mr. BACON. I will if the Senator will allow me to finish the sentence.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.
Mr. BACON. And the delegates from the State of New York were instructed to endeavor to have that incorporated at the earliest possible moment in the Constitution of the United States.

I will now comply with the request of the Senator from Utah. The amendment I intend to propose is to follow the resolution as it came from the Judiciary Committee, and is as follows:

But Congress may make such regulations in any State whenever the legislature thereof shall neglect, refuse, or, from any circumstance, shall be incapable of doing so—

And then the additional sentence is added-and Congress may limit expenditures and require publicity in connection with the nomination and election of Senators.

I simply read that, Mr. President, for the purpose of giving notice that if the Senate should not insist upon its amendment and the question should then recur upon concurring in the House joint resolution I would offer that as an amendment thereto.

Mr. RAYNER. Does the Senator think that that would make which the publicity bill which we have already passed?

Mr. BACON. I think the publicity bill we have passed is already valid, but it would put the joint resolution in such form that the adoption of the joint resolution as it came from the House would not free senatorial elections in the States from the effect of that publicity legislation. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, the publicity bill is undoubtedly valid; but, as the Senator admits, if the original joint resolution were adopted we would have no right to pass a publicity law affecting senatorial elections. . My point is whether the provision of the proposed amendment would be retroactive, or whether we would have to pass another publicity bill if that amendment was adopted.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this simply empowers Congress to do this thing. The objection has been raised—it was raised this morning by the Senator from Wyoming, and I think the objection is well based-that if Congress were to adopt the resolution as it came from the House and as it came from the Judiciary Committee, Congress would not have the right, or it might be claimed that it would not have the right, to require publicity of expenditures in senatorial elections; and the object is to put that matter beyond any possibility of doubt and to confer on Congress full power to legislate in regard to the publicity of all matters concerning the election of Senators, if the resolution as it came from the House should be adopted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BACON, I do. Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia should become a part of the Constitution, would it not be clear that Congress would be limited in its legislation to the occasions enumerated in the Senator's amendment? In other words, Congress would not be able to legislate with reference to the elections of Senators in the States in any other particular, except as specified in the Senator's amendment. Is not that true?

Mr. BACON. There is, as the Senator well knows, in the section of the Constitution at present power, and in the proposed amendment still further power is given to Congress, the same as it now has. Otherwise, if the Senator means to ask me—I suppose it is better to put it into plain language—whether under this phraseology, if it should be adopted, Congress would have the power to legislate as to the manner in which the elections should be conducted, whether they should be allowed to have supervisors at the polls, whether they should be allowed to have marshals at the polls, whether Congress could send soldiers to the polls for the purposes of seeing to the election, I will say undoubtedly this would prevent any such action on the part of Congress. Is that what the Senator had in view?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I did not have that particular thought in mind at all. But if that would be excluded, of course everything else would be excluded except the particular thing specified in the Senator's amendment.

Mr. BACON. I have suggested the other things which occurred to me that Congress might legislate about. Will the Senator now indicate the things in his mind?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I can not foresee what occasions may arise in the future which will call upon Congress for the exercise of this power, but I imagine that it would prevent Congress from fixing, as it has done by a law now in operation, a uniform time for holding the election. It would prevent Congress from providing for the Australian ballot, as it has done. It would prevent Congress from providing for election machines at elec-tions. It might prevent Congress from doing a very great variety of things that the future will disclose to be absolutely necessary.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator be a little more specific? Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have stated three specific things. Mr. BACON. My attention was diverted for the moment.

will ask the Senator to excuse me and repeat them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I stated to the Senator, for example, that it would prevent Congress from by law fixing a uniform time for holding the elections. As the Senator knows, prior to the statute having been adopted elections were held in the various States at different times, some of them in August, some of them in October, some of them in November, and some of them in the early spring months. It was only by virtue of the power which the Senator now seeks to strike down that Congress fixed a uniform date.

Mr. BACON. Congress does not fix a uniform date for the election of Senators now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But when we provide for the election of Senators by vote of the people it would be quite as necessary to fix a uniform date as it is to fix a uniform date for the election of Members of the House. The Senator's amendment would prevent our doing that. That is the complaint I am

Mr. BACON. Well, if that is the only objection of the

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I spoke of another, namely, the power of Congress to fix the Australian ballot for use in the various Mr. BACON. I am very frank to say that I would not be willing that Congress should have that power.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Congress has already exercised the power and provided that all ballots shall be in writing.

Mr. BACON. But that is not the Australian ballot.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; but I say we might desire to do

Mr. BACON. I should certainly object to Congress controlling the State to any such extent as that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What I object to, if the Senator will permit me, is that we are undertaking to tie the hands of Congress for the future. No matter how necessary it may be, we will be wholly unable to do any thing except those particular things specified in the Senator's amendment.

Mr. BACON. I do not feel any disposition to go into a general debate on this subject. I could not do so without very largely repeating what I have more than once said in the Senate, which I have no desire to consume the time of the Senate in doing. The election of Senators now, while it is under the general language of section 4, is one in which practically the States control all the details, except that Congress prescribes the days upon which the legislature, after it has assembled, shall proceed to vote and how the vote shall be counted. But certainly there is nothing in the law now, although the language is applicable both to the election of Senators and the election of Representatives, which gives Congress any of the powers over the election of Senators which it would have if there were the same provision with reference to the election of Senators as there is with reference to the election of Members of the House. In other words, it is an impossibility that Congress shall provide for supervision over the election of Senators through the machinery of the district courts of the United States. It is an impossibility, unless you absolutely destroy the dual system of government we have, that the district courts of the United States should be empowered to appoint marshals to sit in a legislature and supervise the manner in which Senators shall be elected. It is an utter impossibility, without destroying our system of government, that the district courts of the United States should have the power to provide supervisors to superintend an election by the legislature. It is a matter of utter impossibility, without the destruction of our system of government, for Congress to provide a law under which the soldiers of the United States can appear in a legislature and enforce the order of supervisors in the election by a legislature.

Therefore, however we may mix words or however we may try to think that the same provision in the one case applies in the other, practically they do not. Under the present law the States do have the control of the election of Senators, those who are their own peculiar representatives, and provide that in the selection they shall have the supreme voice.

Mr. President, it is a remarkable fact that in the day when the Constitution was formed, with only 13 little States, without any dominating influence by one over the other, without any sectional questions to divide them, because at that time slavery existed in every State except one, without anything to indicate the great necessity of each State controlling its own affairs as that necessity was afterwards developed in the contentions which arose and which have continued for a century-without any of these things, I say, it is a most remarkable fact that each of the 13 States, with nothing in their past to point to them the future, but the contrary, realized to the utmost degree the importance of self-control in its internal affairs and of its elections by each State, and realized it to a degree, I started to say, infinitely greater than it is realized by the States at the present day.

So it was when the Constitution of the United States, as framed in the convention, was sent to the several States for their ratification, while the States differed, one State objecting in a degree to one provision and another State in a degree to another provision, there was but one question upon which all the States agreed. The record will prove what I am saying, that all the States agreed on this one proposition: That in the election of Senators and of Representatives, while Congress should have the power or did have the power, which is prescribed in the fourth section, it should only be exercised, was expressed by the convention of New York, when the States themselves might fail to exercise it or when for any reason they were incapable of exercising it.

Without exception, every State the records of which have been preserved or can be found, beginning at New Hampshire and going to the extreme South, embodied in their adoption of the Constitution their demand that if the power of the Federal Government to supervise elections in the States should remain it should only be exercised, in the language of the convention of New York, whenever the legislature thereof shall neglect, refuse, or from any circumstance shall be incapable of doing so.

Mr. President, the importance of that is many times greater now, with 46 States, than it was in the days of 13 States, because in proportion as the country grows larger in the same proportion are our interests diverse; in the same proportion is it true that what is appropriate for one section is not appropriate for another; and in the same degree there must be the resulting necessity and importance that each State should, as far as possible, control within its own limits and by its own authority the things which relate to its own peculiar affairs. The thing which in that day impressed those 13 States as being the most important of all things relating to the internal affairs of a State was the right to control its elections, and that they should not be controlled by the Federal Government except in a case where the States should neglect or refuse or where they should be in a position that they were incapable of properly dis-

Mr. President, I did not intend to say this much because, as I have said, I can say nothing but what is a repetition of what I have already said, and what I have said this morning is a repetition of what I have heretofore said. I have endeavored to resist the temptation which I have to go further in the subject, and I do resist it. It is not proper that I should do so under the circumstances.

I simply ask, Mr. President, that the Senate will refuse to insist upon its disagreement, that it will bring the matter again to the attention of the Senate to act upon the joint resolution as it comes from the House and as it has been reported to this body by the Judiciary Committee, and that when that is done I may have the opportunity, which of course I will have, of presenting this amendment, which will preserve two things. It will preserve the right of the Federal Government to regulate the manner of these elections in every case where the State should itself refuse or neglect to do so, or where it shall be incapable of doing so, and the second thing which will be accomplished by the amendment will be to give the Congress of the United States the full and unrestricted power to legislate as to all matters which are necessary to limit expenses and secure publicity in all proceedings relating to the election of Senators

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, when this measure was before the Senate on a former day it was with some reluctance that I voted for the House provision. I did not vote for it because I preferred to have the provision of section 4, Article I, of the Constitution stricken out—that is, that Congress should have supervisory power as to the manner and the time of choosing Senators—but it was in the hope that the joint resolution would be amended and would be agreed to in conference. In my anxiety to see the Constitution so amended as to give to the people the right to choose their Senators by a popular vote I voted for it.

I find, however, that the conference committee has failed to agree. But they have agreed to disagree. I said to Senators on this floor that I preferred to vote for the resolution in the form that it was presented by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] or the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Bristow]. Now, since the conference committee has failed to agree I shall vote for the resolution as it has been presented by the Senator from Kansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senater from Wyoming [Mr. Clark] that the Senate insist upon its amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Lea]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER], and vote. I vote "yea." I make this announcement

Mr. NIXON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Secator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who is absent to-day on account of public business. If he were here, he would vote "yea." I transfer my pair to the senior Senator would vote "yea." I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Martin], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when Mr. Poindexter's name was called). My colleague [Mr. Poindexter] is absent. I think, from the city. I do not know how he would vote on this question, if present.

Mr. REED (after having voted in the negative). Mr. President, I voted inadvertently. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is serving on the investigation of the Titanic disaster. I therefore agreed with him that I would pair on this vote. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay." I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Clarp]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were present and I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I desire again to state that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMTH] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reed].

The roll call was concluded. Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to inquire if the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has voted. The VICE PRESIDENT. He has voted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I vote "nay."

So the motion of Mr. CLARK of Wyoming that the Senate insist on its amendment was agreed to.

LOANS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar is in order under Rule VIII.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8768) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BORAH. Is the bill on the calendar under Rule VIII? Mr. CURTIS. It is; and I gave notice that I would call it up to-day

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the committee be considered first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be followed. The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will read the bill for action on the amendments of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 23, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert the following

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed so as to prevent any individual from loaning the money of such individual at a rate of interest not to exceed 10 per cent per annum, and no such person shall be required to obtain a license for engaging in such business.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 5, after the word "thereon," in line 5, to insert:

Said bond shall be renewed and refiled annually in October of each year, or the licensed person, firm, voluntary association, joint-stock company, incorporated society, or corporation shall, within 30 days thereafter, cease doing business, and their license shall be revoked by the said commissioners, but said bond, until renewed and refiled as aforesaid, shall be and remain in full force and effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 6, after the words "called for," in line 8, to insert "said statement or report to be published in at least one newspaper of general circulation in the District of Columbia, in such manner as may be directed by the said commissioners," so as to read:

Every such person, firm, voluntary association, joint-stock company, incorporated society, or corporation conducting such business shall, on or before the 20th day of January of each year, make to the said commissioners an annual statement in the form of a trial balance of its books on the 31st day of December in each year, specifying the different kinds of its liabilities and the different kinds of its assets, stating the amount of each, together with such other information as may be called for, said statement or report to be published in at least one newspaper of general circulation in the District of Columbia, in such manner as may be directed by the said commissioners.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 5, on page 7, line 4, to insert:

No such loan greater than $100 shall be made to any one person: Provided, That any person contracting, directly or indirectly, for or receiving a greater rate of interest than that fixed in this act, shall forfeit all interest so contracted for or received; and in addition thereto shall forfeit to the borrower a sum of money, to be deducted from the amount due for principal, equal to one-fourth of the principal sum: And provided further, That any person in the employ of the Government violating any of the provisions of this act shall forfeit his office or position, and be removed from the same.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that seems to be a new provision since we last had this matter up for consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. No. Mr. President; the Senator is mistaken. That is exactly the Senate provision that was agreed to when the bill was heretofore passed. The Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, in considering this House bill, put in the Senate amendment, this one, and also the amendment on page 2, I think, in which the Senator was interested, or the amendment before that, allowing individuals to make loans.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, my recollection is distinct in regard to the first amendment referred to by the Senator I believe I offered an amendment covering that subject, and I have no recollection of the amendment on page 7, commencing with line 5. I think probably, while of course the Senator states that matter was considered by the Sen-

Mr. CURTIS. It was. I took it from the bill as it passed the Senate.

I was probably not present in the Chamber idered. There is a limitation of $100. I Mr. HEYBURN. when it was considered. would be led to inquire where a man would go to get $200. There is no provision in the bill under which a man could borrow $200

Mr. CURTIS. I will say very frankly to the Senator from Idaho, in view of the small interest provided for—1 per cent that I should have no objection to making the limitation $200. The other limit of $100 was placed in the bill because of the high rate of interest that was permitted at the time,

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out, in line 5, page 7, the word "one," before the word "hundred," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "two," so as to read "two hundred dollars."

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to that, Mr. President. The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. In another part of this same amendment, I desire to direct the attention to the proviso in lines 12, 13, 14, and 15. I would ask the Senator from Kansas whether that is as it was in the bill which passed the Senate?

Mr. CURTIS. It is exactly in the same language, Mr. HEYBURN. It reads:

That any person in the employ of the Government violating any of the provisions of this act shall forfeit his office or position and be removed from the same.

There is no provision as to how the employee shall be removed from his office, and I felt the same doubt as to whether or not the committee had overlooked that fact. The mere declaration by Congress that a man in the executive department shall forfeit his office for doing a thing, without investigation or trial, and no method being provided for the manner of determining whether or not he shall forfeit his office, seems to me to be quite deficient. I would not know how to execute that provision of this bill, because we can not create a quasi judicial tribunal that would be authorized to determine whether a man has forfeited his office or not, and I can not think it possible that that bad passed the Senate in that shape. I would inquire of the Senator whether he thinks that provision is sufficient?

Mr. CURTIS. I think it would be notice to the chief or Secretary under whose authority the party might be working to carry out the direction, if it was found that the party had been loaning money in violation of this act.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, that would be merely the officer discharging the man and not Congress

Mr. CURTIS. It was not the intention of Congress to hold an investigation, but it was simply a declaration of the office being forfeited by a violation of the act, which was to be carried out, of course, by the superior officer of the subordinate.

Mr. HEYBURN. But there is no provision here as to the manner of ascertaining whether a Government employee has made himself amenable to this law.

Mr. CURTIS. All the departments have the right to investigate and inquire into loans made by the employees. They have already done so in the Pension Office, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and, as I understand, in the Printing Office, and some employees were dismissed. Some of them had their salaries reduced. The Senator from Idaho will no doubt remember that there has been a great abuse of this right to loan money practiced by some of the people in the departments in this city, though it has been carried on as a regular business.

Mr. HEYBURN, Mr. President, I do recall the statements and doubtless other statements in regard to that. Since this matter was before the Senate, men who were supposed to be the subjects of this legislation have spoken to me, and in more than one case they have recited conditions where to deprive them of the right to anticipate their salary would leave them in great distress. One in particular cited me the case of an accident, in which a member of his family was injured, an amputation was necessary, and a long and expensive hospital service, and he said to me that except for the fact that he was able to anticipate his salary for several months he would have been utterly destitute and unable to afford assistance to his family. I have had men from time to time stop and talk to me about it or drop in to talk to me about it. There are two sides to the question, which is quite a serious one. You place a limitation of $200. You can not, as a rule, get a surgeon to perform an operation for that sum-I mean to amputate a limb or to do other things that might be necessary-and you leave a man in a very bad position. I had cause to inquire within a few hours as to the probable cost of some of these things in anticipation of this provision in the bill. I think the committee should have considered that matter more carefully.

Mr. CURTIS. I will say to the Senator that the committee did give the provision very careful consideration. It was recommended to the Senate in the original Senate bill, and when the House bill came back, the Senate committee, if I may state what the committee did, were unanimously in favor of restoring this provision. It was restored after considerable debate in the committee as to the various kinds of loans, the business these people were conducting, and the fact that some of those employed in the Government departments were taking advantage of their knowledge of the condition of their neighbors and loaning money in violation of the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thought that the moving cause, out of which this legislation grew, was on the other side of the slate.

I think that is true. Mr. CURTIS.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was originally aimed at those who have been denominated as "loan sharks"—

Mr. CURTIS. That is true. Mr. HEYBURN. Without giving as much consideration, perhaps, as should have been given to those who are compelled to borrow money in a market or a class of markets peculiarly adapted to their wants. Many people can not go to a bank and get money under any circumstances; they have no collatthat the banks are authorized to receive.

While the Senator in charge of the bill has consented to raise to $200 the amount which may be loaned to one person, that is a very meager amount in the case of an accident—a very small amount-and in the meantime the family must go on living while this additional expense is being incurred. No matter what he might be charged for the money, the necessity for having it is so great and the suffering incident to not having it is so great that that side of the question ought to receive special consideration.

I have not been friendly to this legislation from the beginning.

I have found that out before.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am neither a borrower nor a lender. look at it purely from the humanitarian standpoint. The right to borrow money is as sacred to a man as any other property This proviright that he has under our form of Government. sion is intended to strike at Government employees. rather a severe charge to make, that they are not capable of protecting themselves in the ordinary transactions of life. it is true, perhaps we had better submit them again to a civilservice examination.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator misconstrues the language. It is only to apply to Government employees who loan money in violation of the provisions of the

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, the general provisions of the bill would apply to Government employees, whether they loan money or not. I was present when at least a part of the discussion took place heretofore, and it was told in vivid terms how Government employees anticipated their salary in this way and were induced to do so by men who profited by it. We ought not to have many people in the public service who do not have business ability enough to protect themselves, for they are presumed to have passed a civil-service examination, after which no charge can be made against their capacity. That gives them a clean bill of health. Of course it is a fraud; it was conceived in fraud and has been worked out in iniquity. The right to be a serving citizen of this Government has been limited to a few. I am not going to enter at length into that question, but it has been, perhaps, the greatest fraud that has been perpetrated upon the American citizen. There is an inborn right in every child born in this country to become a participant in the Government as well as a beneficiary under it.

Mr. President, there is no hope at this time of doing more than to point out these things, but it is profitable sometimes to point out mistakes that are being made or have been made, in order that the people may think about them and avoid them in the future. I do not believe the charge can be proved that so large a proportion of the Government employees are weak and helpless and in the hands of these money charmers as to make it necessary to legislate against their natural right to engage in a business transaction. I suppose some of these money lenders are very decent men and have some of the spirit of humanity in them; and perhaps others-no proof has been introduced to that effect—but perhaps others are heartless and unkind and crush people because of their necessities.

The bill is too general in its terms. Then, again, it creates a monopoly in the business of loaning money in those who have better opportunities, perhaps; it gives a monopoly in loaning money to the banks, that do not pay the license proposed by this bill. The bill did contain a provision that would have prevented a person from loaning his own money, but it has been amended in that respect so far as to allow a person to loan his own money. Whether he could loan the money of a brother or sister or parent, however, is a question.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it was not the intention of the committee, I hope the Senator will permit me to say, to exclude any person from loaning his or her own money. It never was the intention of the committee to prohibit the loaning of money by individuals. It is true that the bill as originally reported contained such a provision, but the Senator pointed out that defect and it gave the committee pleasure to have it corrected.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I understand that. Now, as the bill has been amended, the question arises, Could a trustee for minor children loan the money of the minor children? It would not seem so from reading the amendment. Can any person standing in such relation to others loan their money without taking out a license? If not, then he will have to hire a bank to do it.

Mr. CURTIS. The committee took the position that any person who was not engaged in the regular business of loaning money—that is, who did not depend upon it wholly—did not come within the provisions of this act. It was only to apply to those engaged in the business.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I understand that, and I am not attacking the motives of the committee; but I want the bill to go out properly vouched for. I want the record that accompanies it to be such a one as can be referred to at any time for the purpose of determining the will of the legislators. That is quite important in measures of this kind. It is unusual legislation. I recall no other instance in the history of our country where such a thing has been attempted, either by the General Government or by any of the lesser governments. I have given attention to the pawnbrokers' laws in various parts of the United States. I find none that goes as far as this measure goes. This great Government of the United States is reaching out a protecting hand to prevent its own employees, or those dependent upon the employees, from being imposed upon.

This bill does not sufficiently cover people who sell furniture on installments, a business which perhaps creates more distress than any other transactions among people of very limited means. If I am mistaken in that I ask the Senator now to correct me, because I have gone through it hastily to-day, carrying forward my recollection of its provisions on former occasions.

There is still another thing. The business of men who go into the houses of other people and solicit the opportunity of loaning money upon the furniture which is necessary for the comfort, aye, for the very existence of a household, is not properly taken care of.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, there is a separate act of Congress applying to that class. It was approved March 3, 1891. When this measure was under consideration on a previous occasion all manner of questions were asked with reference to the working of that law as well as the pawnbrokers' law. No objection, however, was raised to the working of the act of 1891 relative to second-hand dealers and people engaged in similar business.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was calling attention to it more for the purpose of pointing out the laxity of those laws as compared with this bill, or the failure of this bill to coordinate with the pawnbrokers' and other laws.

We are in danger sometimes of becoming too sentimental in regard to these questions. I remember when the newspapers first took this matter up. It was set forth that some person at that time had been badly treated by reason of having to pay two or three times the principal of the loan and still owed more than the original loan. It was all figured out.

Of course, I would strike as hard at any abuse of that kind as any Member of this body. I would not for a moment defend such a procedure. I would make it so impossible under the law that they would lose the principal and perhaps suffer further punishment, because under the law of human kind no person should be allowed to perpetrate that kind of injustice. But we are dealing now with this bill, and I feel justified in taking the time of the Senate to call attention to these questions in order. that should they be raised hereafter it can not be said that the attention of the Senate was not directed to them. I do not think the provision in regard to Government employees should be in the bill, because I think that it is an express slander upon a class of citizens that ought to command the respect of the people. Suppose we were to assume that Government clerks were bad mannered and pass a law providing that they should not conduct themselves in a certain way upon the public streets, as other people are permitted to conduct themselves. That would be an imputation against them that ought not to be expressed in legislation. So I think that whole paragraph in reference to Government employees should be stricken out. Why not include chauffeurs? Why not say that coachmen should also be included? Why not say the employees of Senators should not have this privilege? Why just confine it to Government employees? Are they a class of people less to be trusted than others? It occurs to me that that provision ought to be stricken out. I think I have expressed my objection to it.

I will move to strike out, after the word "sum," in line 12, the proviso down to and including line 15, and allow the Government employees to be presumably as respectable and as intelligent as anybody else.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope, Mr. President, that that amendment will not be agreed to; but if the Senator has any doubt about this provision applying only to the Government employees loaning money, I would, with the consent of the Senate, of course, be willing to consent to an amendment striking out, after the word "Government," the words "violating any of" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "violating any of" and insert-tion of."

Mr. HEYBURN. I will agree to that, because I do not think that a Government employee should be permitted to do the very things I have been speaking against; but this provision reads, "violating any of the provisions of this act." That applies to the whole act; it applies to the borrower, the lender, and every-

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator will withdraw his amend-

Mr. HEYBURN. I will withdraw my amendment for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Kansas to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho withdraws the amendment he offered a moment ago.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to strike out, in line 13, after the word "Government," the words "violating any of" and to insert in lieu thereof "who shall loan money in violation of."

Mr. HEYBURN. That is certainly an improvement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Secretary. On page 7, line 13, strike out the words "violating any of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "who shall loan money in violation of," so as to read:

That any person in the employ of the Government who shall loan money in violation of the provisions of this act shall forfeit his office or position and be removed from the same.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was to strike out section 7, as follows: The next amendment was to strike out section 7, as follows:
Sec. 7. Whoever violates any of the provisions of this act shall be punished by a forfeiture of all unpaid interest and by a fine of not more than $200, or by imprisonment in the jail or the workhouse of the District of Columbia for not more than 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, and a second or any subsequent violation of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500, or by imprisonment in the jail or workhouse of the District of Columbia for not less than 60 days nor more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. The said commissioners shall cause the corporation counsel to institute proceedings for the enforcement of this act before any court of competent jurisdiction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. That in any foreclosure on any loan made under this act no charges of attorneys' or agents' fees shall be made or collected which will exceed 10 per cent of the amount found due in such foreclosure proceedings.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 9, as follows:

SEC. 9. That in any contract made in pursuance of the provisions of this act it shall be unlawful to incorporate any provision for liquidated or other damages as a penalty for any default or forfeiture thereunder.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 10, as follows:

Sec. 10. That nothing contained in this act shall be held to apply to the legitimate business of national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, or real estate brokers, as defined in the act of Congress of July 1, 1902.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add a new section as section 7, as follows:

Sec. 7. That any violation of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 and not greater than $200, or by imprisonment in the jail or the workhouse of the District of Columbia for not less than 5 nor more than 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. The said commissioners shall cause the corporation counsel to institute criminal proceedings for the enforcement of this act before any court of competent jurisdiction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add a new section as section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. That nothing contained in this act shall be held to apply to the legitimate business of national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, or to the business of pawnbrokers, or real-estate brokers, as defined in the act of Congress of July 1, 1902.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am still of the opinion that that section should be stricken out. It is such a discrimination in favor of one class of business men and against another as is repugnant to my sense of justice. If we prevented those dealt with in the previous section from doing business, then it would not be open to the objection I urge; but we permit them to do business, only controlling or regulating it. Their business, when transacted within the provisions of this statute, is as legitimate a business as that of those mentioned in section 8.

Mr. CURTIS. But there are separate acts of Congress applying to those other businesses, and there has been absolutely no complaint made to the committee. In fact, officers of the city gated this matter say that, in their judgment, it would be very unwise to change the present laws applying to these other people, and for that reason-

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know what would be the judgment of men who are interested in it; neither do I feel called upon to consider what their judgment might be in regard to it.

Mr. CURTIS. May I interrupt the Senator?
Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.
Mr. CURTIS. I did not say the men interested in the matter. I said officials of the city government and members of business men's committees. Some of them have talked with me; men who have volunteered their services to help these people out. and who are not interested in any loan companies of any kind or character, but who as citizens of the District of Columbia wish to help the poorer classes of people, and who have therefore taken an interest in this matter.

I was told several days ago that a committee of 100 of the business men of this city was appointed some 10 or 12 years ago to look into these questions, and they in turn appointed a committee of 10. The gentleman who talked to me was a member of that committee of 10, and he is a man not engaged in any business that would be at all interested in this bill or any of the other bills.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under the constitution of any State, where my attention has been called to their constitutions, such a provision would be held void without any doubt by any court. should be governed somewhat by the recognized principles of justice, even though there happens to be no power above us in regard to legislating for the District of Columbia. administration of this law in the hands of laymen, the commissioners. And we say to the first class of people, "Your business is legitimate; you have a perfect right to do it. We will charge you a license for doing it." That recognizes and confirms the legitimacy of the business.

Whenever the public or the government-whatever government it may be-accepts a license from parties to transact business, they can not controvert the validity of the business for which the license is granted. That is a rule of general application. They determine that when they grant the license, Having granted the license, the State is not at liberty to say,

"Your business is an illegitimate one."

The same is true here. The Government is proposing to grant a license to these men to do business, but we will make two laws. We will make one law governing the banks and trust companies, and so on, and we will make another law governing you, because you, perhaps, do not pay so much rent-is it?-or do not have so much invested in buildings. It does not appeal to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, might it not be thought a sufficient reason that the national banks, trust companies, and other organizations named are taxed quite heavily in the District of Columbia? They pay a tax to the Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. They do not pay any such tax as this.

Mr. GALLINGER. They pay a larger tax. They pay a tax of G per cent on their business.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but then there is a tax here-a man might loan $1,000, and he would pay a tax of $500 for loaning $1,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. He might loan $1,000 or he might loan $50,000. He is not limited to $1,000. He may loan $100,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. The tax on that would be 10 per cent. I would not put it on that basis. I would deal with this question just as though we had no more license here in legislating than we would have in a State. There is no State in which such a law as this would be valid. Whether or not we are bound by the restrictions in a State should not influence us, if the moral principle is right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator sure that there are no laws in any of the States along the lines of this proposed legislation?

Mr. HEYBURN. I know of none.

I think the Senator misunderstands me. There are no laws in the United States anywhere that permit a discrimination such as that expressed in section 8, giving to one class of people or one set of people the right to do something that is forbidden to others equally endowed with rights under the Constitution.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand this matter, if the Senator will permit me—I may be in error, though I have given some considerable thought to it—the organizations named in section 8 are now governed by separate acts. There is a different law for each one of them. They are on the statute book. The proposition here is that this legislation shall not interfere government and business men's committees who have investi- with the laws that govern those other organizations.

Mr. HEYBURN. But they have laws more favorable for transacting the same business under the same legal right.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are transacting an entirely different class of business. They are not robbing the poor as these loan sharks are, which is an utter abomination as it exists in this city to-day; it is a disgrace.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator would not favor charging, for instance, to be personal, the Riggs Bank one license or applying one condition and applying a different one to the Commercial National? The Senator would say that was unfair on the face of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would not do that, and the law does not do it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand the Senator has just called attention to the fact that it does. In line 13 there is a class of institutions referred to. Those institutions are permitted to engage in the same business on more favorable terms than the institutions which are referred to in section 5.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho suspend for a moment? The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other puroses," approved August 5, 1909. Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Before that request is put I desire to make a brief statement, with the consent of the Senator from Idaho.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield for that purpose?

Mr. HEYBURN. I was unable to hear the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks the Senator from Idaho to yield to him for the purpose of making a statement.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly. Mr. SIMMONS. It is with reference to the unfinished busi-I wish to say that the minority members of the Finance Committee think it desirable that the Senate should enter upon the consideration of the bill to revise the metal schedule as soon as practicable, and that when it is taken up for consideration that it should be pressed as far as is consistent with the rules and usual courtesies of the body until the Senate is ready for final action upon it.

It was my expectation to ask the Senate to begin consideration of the bill on Friday next, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins], who, I understand, intended to present a substitute for the pending measure, is absent from the city, and will not return before Friday, so that his proposed substitute will not be introduced earlier than that day. After conference with a number of Senators on both sides of the Chamber, I find a general desire that the Senate should have before it the proposed bill of the Senator from Iowa when the debate begins, so that the two bills may be discussed together. In order that that course may be pursued, it is thought expedient to postpone consideration of the bill until Monday.

On Monday it is my purpose to ask the Senate to take up the bill and to keep the measure as far as may be before the Senate until there is a vote. With this object in view, I hope Senators who expect to participate in the debate will endeavor to be ready to go on with the debate after this week.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.
Mr. PENROSE. I have just entered the Chamber. Will Mr. PENROSE. the Senator from North Carolina kindly advise me as to his proposition?

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated, Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator, that on Monday next we on this side of the Chamber hope to be able to take up the bill for consideration and to keep it continuously before the Senate until we are ready to vote

I stated I would prefer the bill should be taken up this week, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who is expecting to offer a bill covering the same subject as a substitute, was absent from the city and would not be back before Friday, and that as many Senators seemed to desire that both bills should be before the Senate when the debate begins I would not ask for consideration of the bill before Monday next.

Mr. PENROSE. In that case, when does the Senator from North Carolina desire to bring the bill up?

Mr. SIMMONS. On Monday next.

Mr. PENROSE. On Monday of next week? Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is what I said.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to cooperate in every way to expedite these bills and all other bills pending before the Senate. As far as I know, it will be satisfactory to the other members of the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it for granted the Senator would not insist upon any discussion of this bill until the amendment that is to be offered by the Senator from Iowa is before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I have said, provided—— Mr. SMOOT. If the amendment is not offered by that time, of course I understand the Senator to agree that it would not be proper to discuss the bill until it is offered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would not feel that I could go quite that far. I hope the Senator from Iowa will offer his bill this week or early next week. But if he should not offer it by Monday or Tuesday of next week, I would not feel that we should wait longer. I think from his conversation with me before leaving the city that the Senator from Iowa will be ready to offer his bill shortly after his return to the city, probably Saturday or Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the Senator perhaps knows just when the Senator from Iowa will be prepared and will offer his bill, but as far as I am concerned-

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know any further than his statement to me.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not want to agree that we should go on and discuss the bill unless the Senate should so order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina makes no request now except that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMOOT. I came in afterwards. I thought that he had probably made a request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was simply that the unfinished business be laid aside.

Mr. PENROSE. I should think it would be a very good thing to have the bill ready on Monday and to have it before the Senate. Then any Senator can address the Senate on the bill at his convenience. As far as I am concerned, whenever I am ready I shall exercise my privilege of addressing the Senate on the metal bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course.
Mr. PENROSE. I do not imagine that we have to take up the bill here and plunge into a discussion in a continuous way.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator entirely misunderstood me, Mr. President. I said it was my desire and that of my associates, the minority members of the committee, that the bill should be taken up on Monday and that, if possible, the debate should go on continuously until we were ready to vote. I stated further probably I made that statement in the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania—that, in order that Senators on this side of the chamber might be ready, so that there would be no break in the debate, I had requested them to endeavor to be ready to go on with the discussion next week.

Mr. PENROSE. I assume, Mr. President, that the friends of the measure would naturally open the discussion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I expect, Mr. President, when I call up the measure on Monday, to make an opening statement and to some extent discuss the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. As far as I am personally concerned, I would not delay the measure for the purpose of making any remarks myself if the Senate can come to an early vote on the bill. As I am not prepared, I shall not make that a reason for asking for delay. I am advised of only two Senators besides myself on the Republican side who intend to make any remarks on the measure.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President— Mr. PENROSE. There may be others. I do not say that there are not.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think we want to be foreclosed there. I intend——

Mr. McCUMBER. There are several of us who want to be heard.

Mr. HEYBURN. I intend to discuss the measure at length and in detail-

Mr. SMOOT. I expect to discuss it at length.

Mr. HEYBURN. And to take just as much time as it seems proper to take.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, just one word. that every Senator will exercise his right to discuss the bill as long as he desires. So far as I am concerned, I shall not, in management of the bill, violate any of the courtesies of the Senate. I shall not insist upon a vote as long as there is any Senator who desires to discuss the measure, and will give assurance that he will be ready to do so in a reasonable time. But I do desire, and I think the country desires, that the Senate should proceed to the consideration at the earliest possible day of these tariff measures. I trust that there may be no objection to taking up this bill on Monday and that Senators on both sides will get ready for the discussion, so that final action will not be unnecessarily delayed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly. Mr. McCUMBER. I presume that the bill can be taken up at any time by the vote of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course.

Mr. McCUMBER. And undoubtedly it will be taken up at a reasonable time. The majority of the Committee on Finance have reported negatively upon the bill. Therefore the affirmative side is with the minority in this case. I can see justification for the Senator's seeking, as an affirmative measure, to have it brought before the Senate as soon as practicable. But the Senator's own argument has indicated something that will probably at any rate prevent an early and proper consideration. A new bill, I understand, is suggested-something that no Member of the Senate yet knows anything about, an entire substitute. The Senator does not expect that that substitute will be presented before next Saturday or next Monday, and immediately, without opportunity-

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, I think it will be submitted Saturday.

Mr. McCUMBER. But not before then? Mr. SIMMONS. Not before then. Mr. McCUMBER. And then, without any opportunity to investigate it by the Finance Committee of the Senate or an opportunity for Senators to investigate it, the Senator indicates that we ought to immediately begin the discussion, which necessarily would be also a discussion of a new bill.

It seems to me that a few days at least ought to elapse after the new bill as a substitute has been submitted as an amendment, in order that Senators may have an opportunity to acquaint themselves with it and to compare its provisions with the present law and ascertain the effect of the several provisions contained in it. For that reason it seems to me the Senator ought not to ask us to agree to go into a consideration of a matter the moment the other proposition is before us.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Iowa will doubtless wish full time to discuss his bill. I shall expect to make a statement with reference to the House bill. I do not see why it would be necessary to delay those statements. Those statements at least might be made on Monday or Tuesday. would probably occupy most of the time the two days.

Mr. McCUMBER. There could be no purpose to delay a statement to be made by any Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the committee desires to consider the substitute, but little time would be required for that purpose, I should imagine.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator's suggestion was that we should take it up that day and press it day after day for consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not mean-

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that would be hurrying too rapidly. Mr. SIMMONS. I did not mean to unduly press it. I simply meant that I desired, and I thought that was the wish of the minority members of the committee, that once the bill was taken up it should be pressed under the rules, with due reference, of course, to the courtesy that obtains in the Senate. Of course, if Senators are not ready to speak, I would not think about asking for a vote without according them reasonable time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply make the suggestion that in all probability a great many who might be ready to discuss the present bill at the present time would scarcely be able to be in position to discuss intelligently a new and a proposed bill immediately after its introduction in the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, Mr. President, after the Senator from Iowa has made his speech and I have made my statement, if no one else is ready to speak on this side or that side, the bill can be laid temporarily aside until some Senator is ready. I should like, unless there is serious objection to it, to have the bill taken up on Monday next.
Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business is now temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment, Mr. President, before it is laid aside.

I do not want Senators to proceed under the assumption that this program so nicely laid out is going to be carried out, because I regard the matter of such importance that I shall feel not only at liberty to resort to whatever parliamentary proceedings may accomplish my purpose, but I should feel that I was lacking in the performance of my duties to allow a measure like this to pass out of this body under the suggestions which have been made that it would be debated by two people, and let it go out to the public it may be debated by two people. My judgment would lead me to believe that it will be debated by a great many of the Republicans and Democrats in this body and will be debated at length, with no leading strings or limit on that debate.

And there will be no unanimous agreement until after it has been debated to the satisfaction of everybody. There will be no time fixed for anything in the matter. Had I my way, if I thought there was a vote not adverse in sight on this matter in this body, it would hardly reach that vote until the weather was cool enough and the grain garnered in the garners and the people had something to feed themselves with during the conditions that would follow this kind of legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the pending business will be laid aside.

LOANS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8768) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia to insert a new section as section 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the pending amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not intend to do more than suggest an amendment by striking out section 8. But I will not precipitate a debate at this time upon that motion. I have said all I had to say about it.

The amendment was agreed to.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read section 9, as follows:

SEC. 9. That the enforcement of this act shall be intrusted to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to make all rules and regulations necessary in their judgment for the conduct of such business and the enforcement of this act in addition hereto and not inconsistent herewith.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, just a moment there. are conferring the powers of the police court upon the District of Columbia. Can we do it? Have we power to rest the enforcement of an act that is both civil and criminal or penal in its terms with the District of Columbia? You are only getting into court on a proceedings of certiorari or mandamus or some other proceedings if you undertake that. If the Senator from Kausas was the attorney for some one whose interests were sufficiently great to induce him to resist this kind of legislation, he would raise that question the first minute he was in court.

He would say, "Is this a court or is this an executive body? Has this court the power to sit in judgment upon the reasonableness of conduct of men who are acting under the law, under a license?" and, of course, I presume that the tribunal would say, "Certainly we have all the power." But there are other tribunals.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield-Mr. HEYBURN. I have said all I intended to say.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the Senator misconstrues the act. It simply leaves it in the hands of the commissioners to report when complaint is made and assist parties who might be unable to help themselves.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed. The title was amended so as to read: "An act to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, pawnbrokers, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 438, authorizing the Committee on Public Lands to employ a stenographer, and so forth.
Mr. McCUMBER. All of which I object to. We have been waiting to reach the calendar. I have a number of pension bills in charge that are nearly two months behind waiting to be reached one after another. I shall not consent to picking out any of the bills now, because day after day we have waited here until we could reach some of these bills until at least 20 men have died whose names were upon the bills. I insist if we go to the calendar that we shall take up and dispose of these bills.

Mr. SMOOT. In justification for my request, I will say that to-morrow morning there is a very important hearing upon land matters in the State of Oregon. The committee has no authority whatever to have its hearings reported. The resolution is simply an authorization to secure a stenographer to report the hearings. There are a number of persons here from Oregon, and the meeting is called for to-morrow. A number will be here from Colorado, and it is simply

Mr. McCUMBER. If it is nothing more than a mere matter of request for authority to employ a stenographer to take testimony, on which there will be no debate, I will withdraw my

Mr. SMOOT. That is all there is to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota withdraws his objection. The Secretary will read the resolu-

The Secretary read Senate resolution 255, which had been reported by Mr. Briggs, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, March 21, 1912, as

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have printed such hearings and such other papers as may be deemed necessary in connection with subjects heretofore considered or to be considered by said committee during the Sixty-second Congress, and that the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the said committee and all subcommittees thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. CULLOM. I expected to ask the privilege of passing a little bill myself, but, as the Senator from North Dakota wants to take up the pension bills, I will forego the request.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the con-

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it ought to be for unobjected cases if we are going to make any progress.

Mr. SMOOT. I will modify the motion so as to make it a request and have it apply to unobjected cases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request as modified, to consider unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SHIVELY. Under that order it would not be in order to move to take up any bill, notwithstanding an objection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would not. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 2518) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war was announced as first on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

FERDINAND TOBE.

The bill (S. 1484) for the relief of Ferdinand Tobe was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 10, after the word "That," to strike out "other than as above set forth," and in line 12, after the words "prior to," to strike out "or by reason ' so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Ferdinand Tobe, who was a private of Company A, Fifty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 30th day of June, 1863: Provided, That no pay, bounty, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

the beneficiary the rights, privileges, and benefits of an honorably discharged soldier, but it also places him in a position to draw a pension.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary read the provision as it will be when amended.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Secretary had finished the reading

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the provision as amended be read again.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is the way it reads with the words stricken out, as proposed by the amendment. Evidently the bill intends not only to remove the dishonorable discharge, but it also confers upon the beneficiary the right to draw a pension hereafter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this bill was not reported by me, and the Senator who reported it is out of the Chamber. will say, however, that in almost every case-I do not know but that I might say in every case—of correcting military records we now report bills for the purpose of giving the soldier a pensionable status hereafter, so that he may draw a pension for the rest of his life. This bill gives the soldier no back pay or pension, but gives him a pensionable status. Of course, the Pension Bureau will not allow any pension to a discharged soldier who has a stain of dishonorable discharge on his record. This is a case, however, where there seems to have been, in the minds of the committee, an excusable cause for pardon, if I may call it that. There are cases presented to the committee where a soldier, for instance, was a mere boy in his first enlistment and deserted, but subsequently enlisted, served honorably a full term, and received an honorable discharge from his second enlistment. In such a case as that the committee have felt that at this late day, as there are not many years left for him, he might have a pensionable status.

REPRINT OF REPORT AND RULE ON POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report on the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 21279) and the special rule that was adopted be printed in the RECORD. A good many Members want them, and the print is about exhausted, I understand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the report on the Post Office appropriation bill, together with the rule that was adopted April 18, be printed in the Congressional Record for the information of Members. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the resolution, of course, has already been printed in the Record. Does the gentleman think it necessary to reprint the resolution?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The resolution, I understand, was printed in part in a fragmentary way.

Mr. MANN. It was printed in full, but if there is need I shall not object.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If it is already printed in the Rec-ORD, I will not include that in the request, as I would not want it printed, and I will ask only to have the report printed. Leave was given once before.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I thought the gentleman from Tennessee had withdrawn his request.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I did not except as to the rule. The gentleman from Illinois says the rule is already, printed in the Record in full at one place, and I was not aware of that fact.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee modifies his request as to the rule. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[House Report No. 388, Sixty-second Congress, second session.] POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. Moon of Tennessee, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 21279:
The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in presenting the bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, beg to submit the following explanation thereof:
The estimates covering this bill may be found on pages 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, and 371 of the Book of Estimates, and in the revised estimates submitted by the Postmaster General; an aggregate of $261,-180,063. The committee recommends $259,827,749, a decrease in amount of final department estimates of $1,352,314.

The other departments of the Government yield but little, if any, revenue. The Post Office Department yields nearly all the revenue necessary to meet the appropriations made for the service. The report of the Postmaster General shows a small surplus for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, based on the audited accounts to that date, but later audited expenditures chargeable to the same fiscal year show a deficit. [From the report of the Auditor for the Post Office Department to the Postmaster General up to and including June 30, 1911.]

The figures in above table of receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year 1911 cover all audited expenditures on account of that year up to February 17, 1912, as shown by the appended letter from the Auditor for the Post Office Department, with the $25,000 estimated by the auditor, and stated in the closing paragraph of his letter, added. These final figures from the auditor show a deficit in the department for the fiscal year 1911 of $627,845.94, instead of a surplus of $219,118.12, as stated in the table next preceding the comparative table by years.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 21, 1912.

OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,

Washirgton, February 21, 1912.

Hon. John A. Moon,

Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,

House of Representatives.

Sin: Replying to your letter of this date requesting to be furnished with the total revenues of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1911, stated from July 1, 1910, to June 30, 1911, and the total expenditures on account of the fiscal year 1911 up to January, 1912, or to date, I have to advise you that the audited revenues of the postal service for the period July 1, 1910, to June 30, 1911, aggregated $237,879,823.60, and the audited expenditures on account of the fiscal year 1911 during the same period aggregated $230,516,814.45.

The audited expenditures on account of the fiscal year 1911, during the period July 1, 1911, to September 30, 1911, aggregated $7,394,272.72. During the period October 1, 1911, to February 17, 1912, payments have been made by warrant aggregating $571,582.37, making the total audited expenditures on account of the fiscal year 1911, during the period July 1, 1910, to February 17, 1912, $238,482.669.54.

It is impossible at this date to state the expenditures made by postmasters on account of the fiscal year 1911 during the period subsequent to September 30, 1911, for the reason that the quarterly accounts of postmasters for the period October 1, 1911, to December 31, 1911, have not been finally audited. It is estimated, however, that the expenditures made by postmasters during the period October 1, 1911, will not amount to more than $20,000 or $25,000.

Respectfully,

Chas. A. Kram, Auditor.

This provision was inserted in the bill to provide for ultimate protection for a class of employees (railway mail clerks) whose lives are in constant danger in the discharge of their duties, from the defective postal car construction. The date for changes in cars as therein provided was fixed at July, 1917, to avoid injustice being done under the present contracts for the use of mail cars, and to afford the department time for changing cars to class demanded.

Section 7, to provide for a reclassification of railway postal clerks. Section 10, for experimental mail service in villages having post offices of the second and third class.

Section 11, amending the law so as to include the Marine Corps among those who may be designated as naval mail clerks and assistants, and the provision in section 1 providing for the promotion of postal clerks and letter carriers and the ultimate increase of pay to railway postal clerks, are all self-explanatory and manifestly so just as to require no special discussion in this report.

ENERAL.

1,163. The committee of the fourth class. Under existing law we have a general parcel post fixing the postal rate at 1 cent an ounce with a limit of 4 pounds for mall matter of the fourth class (merchandise). This is an ounce and not a pound rate.

By the terms of the International Postal Convention the people of 23 foreign countries may now transmit fourth-class matter (merchandise) through our mails at the rate of 12 cents a pound with a limit of 11 pounds. This is not an ounce rate, but a pound rate I pound. This is not an ounce rate, but a pound rate I pounds. This is not an ounce rate, but a pound rate of a limit of 11 pounds. This is not an ounce rate, but a pound rate for a limit of 11 pounds. This is not an ounce rate, but a pound rate and ilmit for the use of our people in our vide for the rate on a fraction of a pound, but for a flat pound are to a limit of 11 pounds at 12 cents a pound, and each fraction of a pound over 1 pound carried under this section would cost 12 cents. The ounce rate law now in force is not repealed by this section and there is no inconsistency or conflict in the two acts that would operate as a repeal of the ounce postal section by implication. So that one desiring to send a package of less weight than a pound through the mails can do so at the rate of 1 cent an ounce. Thus far the parcel post question seems sufficently clear to assure us against a loss of revenue and detriment to any business conditions in its application.

The advocates of this proposition insist that the rate of 8 cents a pound with no loss of or the transportation of merchandise at a flat rate of 8 cents a pound or less, with a limit of 11 pounds or a greater number of pounds. The advocates of this proposition insist that the rate of 8 cents a pound or less, with a limit of 11 pounds or a greater number of pounds. The advocates of this proposition insist that the rate of 8 cents a pound with no loss of the proposition of the pro wrong direction—paternalistic and dangerous in its tendencies; that it would create an enormous deficit in the Post Office Department; that it would revolutionize the commercial system in the United States; that it would seriously delay the delivery of lightimate mail; that it would deplete or destroy the prosperity of innumerable country towns and villages, and therefore must be regarded as a menace to the welfare of all the people; that it is class legislation in that it discriminates against the country merchant and favors the great retail mall-order houses—that it is in effect a subsidy to the retail mall-order houses—wrong in principle and unfair in practice; and they further insist that a rural parcel post would be an entering wedge for a general parcel post.

post.

The most of people living in the country and engaged in agriculture and other pursuits, so far as we can secure information, and the larger mercantile establishments in the great cities favor an unlimited parcelpost law. The country merchant and nearly all merchants of the smaller cities and towns oppose the law. This seems to be the alignment. Self-interest, the mainspring of most of our actions, seems to be commanding in both factions. We do not think that the advantages elaimed for the establishment of this post will be so great as its ultra-friends claim, nor that the disadvantages would be nearly so great as its enemiles fear.

commanding in both factions. We do not thisk that the advantages claimed for the establishment of this post will be so great as its ultra-freiends claim, nor that the disadvantages would be nearly so great as its meanles fear.

The necessity for conservative legislation in view of such a contention and division among the people is apparent. We should seek to secure all the advantages possible and avoid all the disadvantages that may arise from any proposed legislation in the interests of the masses of the whole people. Laws should bear as nearly as possible equally and justly on all classes under all conditions. We have heard much testimony, very interesting in its details, but for the most part from those who express an opinion from a general view of general conditions. We need specific facts and not merely opinions on which to pass intelligent and satisfactory legislation. It would seem essential that we know how this innovation in our postal system will affect our revenue; what and other innovation in our postal system will affect our revenue; what and the increases it must assume in increased numbers or entitions and the increases it must assume it in greased numbers or entitions and the increases it must assume it in greased numbers of entitions and pay for carriage or not; how far this extra service would interfere with the handling of first, second, and third class mail matter; the probable losses and profits under different rates; the effect on the centralization of trade; whether the express companies could under one system or another secure the short hauls and leave the long and expensive hauls to the Government; whether it would interfere with the express companies contracts with the railroads or not, and use them, or to force the railroad companies to equal rates for the Post Office Department that is granted the express companies could under one system or another secure the short hauls and leave the long and expensive hauls to the Government, whether it would fail to the country. POSTAL-SAVINGS BANKS.

Section 11 carries $400,000 and an unexpended balance of about $205,000, making in all about $605,000 to continue the establishment and maintenance of postal-savings depositories. The estimate for this service was not included in the original estimates, but is supplementary and is explained in the letters of the Postmaster General to the chairman of this committee herewith attached as an appendix. In view of the fact that the postal-savings-bank law is new and the system has not been fully established, the committee recommends the appropriation and legislation asked for, to the end that a full and complete test may be made of this experiment to determine the ultimate value of its continuation. The careful attention of the House is directed to the Appendix. tinuation. Appendix.

Post Office Department, Office of the Postmaster General, Washington, D. C., February 21, 1912.

Hon. John A. Moon, Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives.

My Dear Judge Moon: In compliance with your telephonic request of yesterday, I am sending you herewith a statement of the expenditures and obligations of the postal-savings system to February 1, 1912, the estimated expenditures for the remainder of the fiscal year, and the probable cost of operating the system during 1913, making clear the basis of the department's request for the appropriation of $400,000 and the unexpended balance of the present appropriation.

A summary by months of postal-savings business in 1911 is also inclosed.

Yours, very truly,

FRANK H. HITCHCOCK,

FRANK H. HITCHCOCK, Postmaster General.

[Memorandum relating to the estimate for expenses of the postal sav-ings system during the fiscal year 1913.]

The establishment and operation of the postal savings system was begun under an appropriation of $100,000 provided by the act of June 25, 1910. To this amount the sum of $500,000 was added by the act of March 4, 1911, making a total of $600,000 thus far made available for the expenses of the system. The following statement shows the expenditures and the obligations incurred under these appropriations up to February 1, 1912, an estimate of expenditures during the remainder of the fiscal year and of the unexpended balance June 30, 1912:

One thousand new depositories will be designated each month, thereby making the total number in operation on June 30 next approximately 13,000 and at the end of the fiscal year 1913 approximately 25,000. It is estimated that with each extension of 1,000 offices it will be necessary to employ from six to eight additional clerks.

The estimated cost of the central office for the fiscal year 1913, including equipment and salaries of 225 employees, is $280,000. To this must be added the cost of supplies for the presidential offices now designated and for 16,000 fourth-class offices to be established between now and June 30, 1913. It is estimated that supplies for each first-class post office will cost about $100, for each second-class office $10, and for each third-class office $50. The total estimated cost of continuing the presidential offices already designated is about $110,000. The cost of supplying fourth-class offices will be about the same as for those of the third class, the total estimate for 16,000 offices being $140,000. To this must be added the expenses of the postal savings work in the offices of the Treasurer of the United States and the Auditor for the Post Office Department, estimated at $70,000. These items give a total estimated expense of $800,000. Deducting the estimated unexpended balance of previous appropriations, $200,000, the remaining estimated expense for which an appropriation is recommended is $400,000. This statement may be summed up as follows:

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, with Mr. Hay in the chair.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Prouty].

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I desire first to make a few remarks on the latter part of section 6, which reads as follows:

The presenting by any such person or groups of persons of any grievance or grievances to Congress or any Member thereof shall not constitute or be cause for reduction in rank or compensation or removal of such person or groups of persons from said service.

This provision in this bill, in my judgment, merely restores or guarantees to the civil-service employees of the Postal Department a right that is clearly and unequivocally guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the United States. Article I of the amendment to the Constitution expressly provides in substance that Congress shall pass no law abridging the right of speech or the right to peaceably assemble and petition the Government for redress of grievances.

If the Congress of the United States has no power to thus abridge any portion of our citizenship in their right to petition for redress of grievances, I hardly think that any constitutional lawyer will contend that that right may with impunity be exercised by the executive branch of the Government; and while this Executive order that has been issued in a measure abridges that right, I do not wish to be understood as severely criticizing either of the Chief Executives that promulgated it. It was doubtless designed for a good purpose; but, notwithstanding the great respect that I have for the statesmanship and the wisdom of the President who first promulgated this order, notwithstanding my reverence, almost, for the judicial knowledge and acumen of the illustrious President that repeated the order, I am nevertheless constrained to believe that the founders of our Government had a keener insight into the workings of the human mind and the human soul than those illustrious men. I think our forefathers understood that a liberty-loving, strong, virile humanity would not endure the repression of a right to freely express to the Government their grievances. I am one of those persons who believe that you can never correct discontent, you can never allay agitation, by repressive measures. As far as I have observed the workings in these matters in human life, the more you attempt to check and keep from free expression the more you augment and increase the supposed grievance.

We must remember that those who are engaged under the civil service of the Government are made of the same flesh, are made of the same blood, and they have the same virile spirit that constitutes American citizenship, and when you deprive them of the constitutional right to present their grievances to the men that have the right and the power to correct them you do not prevent them from taking action, but you simply divert their method of action.

In the short stay that I have had in Washington, and especially in the service that I have had upon the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and in the Committee on the District of Columbia, I have learned that this rule has worked in a peculiar way; that while these men are now abridged of the right to appear before committees and before Members of Congress in person, they have effected that appearance by professional attorneys and lobbyists—a thing that is perfectly natural. Water will always find some way to get vent, and so will this impulse of human nature to have a hearing upon questions that involve their rights.

If the committee will permit me, I will call attention to one thing that developed in the hearings in the Committee on the District of Columbia. The committee reported unanimously a bill for increasing the compensation of the policemen at the street crossings. It was doubtless a good bill. It passed this House and it has passed the Senate. To my surprise and to the surprise of the committee, shortly after that bill was passed we found that a lobbyist in this town had a written contract with every one of these policemen by which a certain class that had a greater increase in pay were to pay him $10 a month for a year out of their salary, and another class that received less compensation were to pay him $5 a month for a year out of their salary. their salary. In other words, one class paid this professional lobbyist $120 apiece for a year and the other class $60 apiece for getting this wholesome legislation through.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman allow me to corroborate him concerning lobbyists?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Some years ago I had a bill here reorganizing and increasing the salaries of the firemen.

The bill was favorably reported by a subcommittee, and was taken up in the whole committee and favorably reported to the House, and taken up in the House and was up for passage when I learned that another assessment had been issued by a lobbyist against every member of the fire department. That word came to me just in time to stop the passage of the bill until every fireman received back every dollar that had been taken from him, on the condition that if it was not the bill would not pass the House. The money was paid back.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. PROUTY. With pleasure.
Mr. CLINE. Can the gentleman give the House any information as to how this gentleman got his work in on the proposition, or as to whether or not he did anything at all in forwarding the interests of the policemen in regard to their pay?

Mr. PROUTY. I can not give the gentleman any information with such accuracy as I would desire if anybody were to act upon it. I hardly would be able to act upon it myself. It has been suggested to me that his method of operation was something like this: It was suggested when the matter was up that, so far as my information was concerned, this man had never appeared before the committee. I believe our chairman said that at one time he did appear in his committee room. He was informed by a gentleman somewhat familiar with this matter of lobbying that this professional lobbyist never himself practically appeared in the transaction, but operated somewhat in this manner: He picked out a man, for instance, say, from Massachusetts, who was a member of the committee, or in some place where he could be of service, and he would find some fellow from Massachusetts who knew that man, and he would say to him, "Here, I will give you $50 or $100 if you can get that man to vote favorably on this measure." This man would call on the Member and, under the guise of friendship and under the guise of being very familiar with the matter here in Washington-apparently not with any idea of getting him to do it, but just quietly laying it before him-he would soon work up a sentiment favorable to his measure. I am informed in a somewhat loose way that that is the general plan of their operations.

I may say right here, diverting a little from what I intended to say when I arose, that I am credibly informed that there are scores of contracts of that kind now in force in the city, in which the men have entered into a written contract to get a certain per cent or a fee in case of a favorable report or the favorable passage of measures in this House,

Now, I know that when we investigated this matter somewhat with the police force they said this, and they said it rightfully, too, "We were unjustly discriminated against. Under these rules we can not appeal in person either to the Congressmen or to committees," as they interpreted the rule, for the men or to committees," as they interpreted the rule, for the purpose of getting redress, and therefore they said, "We listened with heart and ears to this seductive approach of the lobbyist and agreed gladly to yield to him a part of our compensation if we could get relief."

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to The CHAIRMAN.

the gentleman from Missouri? With pleasure.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman please insert in his remarks the rule or Executive order, to which he has referred, prohibiting the employees from appealing to their Representa-

Mr. PROUTY. I do not have them in my hands. I supposed everybody in the House was familiar with them. There were three of them, I understand.

Mr, DICKINSON. I thought the gentleman had it as a part of his speech.

Mr. PROUTY. With the permission of the House, I will produce them and print them.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. PROUTY. With pleasure. Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I think it is entirely fair to state, in this connection, that the conditions which the gentleman describes existed long before there were any orders prohibiting persons from approaching any official. It has, perhaps, been 35 years since James Parton, through several articles in the Atlantic Monthly, under the title of "The strikers of the Washington lobby," exposed the whole matter in full, so the condition has not arisen out of an Executive order, but out of the powers of persuasion of some gentlemen that they could get things through Congress, when in fact they foresaw the intent of Congress and sold the results.

Mr. PROUTY. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for the information and suggestion. I have not myself assumed the responsibility of saying that this condition grew out of the rule, but it must be apparent to every candid mind that such a rule would have the effect of aggravating that condition. other words, if you prevent the men from appearing before Congress themselves it creates a condition and an opportunity by which the lobbyist can easily get the ear of these people and say, "I can reach Congress if you can not."

say, "I can reach Congress if you can not."

Mr. CLINE. May I add just a word there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. PROUTY. With pleasure.
Mr. CLINE. I want to corroborate in a few words the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa. It has become so apparent that the House Office Building is frequented by professional lobbyists that people generally know who they are and what their business is. I have in mind two committees that are on the same floor with my office, and two certain gentlemen have taken up their positions at the committee room doors for the last three or four weeks while certain bills have been before. the list three of four weeks while certain ones into been observed those committees. These men are not Members of Congress and are not personally interested in the bills, as I am informed by the policemen in the halls, but are men whose particular business it is to engineer the bills through the committee if possible, through the means suggested by the gentleman from Iowa and other methods. I state this for the purpose of corroborating what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Prouty] has said about the lobbyists in and about the Capitol and the Office Building

Mr. PROUTY. One of my special reasons for supporting this measure is that it will relieve the civil-service employees from the temptations that come to them from their situation, As I said earlier in my remarks, I know that these civil-service employees, if they have real or, perhaps, even imaginary grievances and wrongs, will find some way of expressing themselves, will find some way of reaching Congress; and I think it infinitely better that they be allowed to come for themselves and present their own case than it is to put them in a position where they are compelled to go to these lobbyists,

In my work upon the District Committee and on the Civil Service Reform Committee facts have been brought to my attention which make me sincerely believe that there ought to be a general increase in the salaries of civil-service employees. It seems to be absolutely unanswerable that if the scale of wages fixed half a century ago was then just it is now grossly too small. Every candid man who studies this question must reach the conclusion that the increased cost of living, the changed conditions of life, the high standard of living, the greater demands that are made upon everybody for the education of their children and for the care of their families all point to the fact that there ought to be a real readjustment of salaries, and that that readjustment ought to be in an upward direction.

But what I am trying to impress upon this House is this thought: That I want to deal directly with these people themselves and not through "salary brokers." I know that this will throw down the fence, and I know that I am exposing myself and helping to expose my colleagues to an endless assault, it may be said, from these importuning civil-service employees. I know that; but, so far as I am personally concerned, I would infinitely rather listen to the complaints of these men than to be hounded, as I have been, day and night, by these professional lobbyists.

That is all I had intended to say. In fact, I have said a great deal more on the subject than I had intended.

I might say, however, by way of parentheses, that I have introduced a short bill, practically at the direction of the committee, seeking in a measure to correct these things,

In the first place, it provides that no one shall appear either before an individual Member of Congress or before a committee of Congress in the profession of a lobbyist for hire without disclosing that fact and, if requested, disclosing by whom hired.

The second section of the bill prevents civil-service employees from raising funds to hire people as professional lobbyists and from making these contracts that, I am informed, exist by the hundreds in this town for contingent fees, making such contracts illegal and void and against public policy and, therefore, not collectible. In other words, it is my desire, what little time I remain in this Congress, to get my information first hand from the men who are themselves directly interested. I do not want to have a professional lobbyist, who has no interest in these measures or men except the paltry dollars that he gets, tell me what is my duty toward a great class of our citizenship. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I rose really to discuss another proposition.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.
Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman has adverted to the fact that civil-service employees are not well paid. I call his attention to the fact that the large mercantile establishments in this city have interested themselves in the wages of the civil-service employees. Have you made any investigation to find out which is the better paymaster, the Government of the United States or these large mercantile establishments who have so deeply interested themselves in governmental employees?

Mr. PROUTY. No, sir; I have not. I have, from my own personal connection with some institutions, facts that would warrant me in asserting that as a rule Government employees do not get as good compensation as the institutions with which I am connected pay men for similar service.

But I will go back to the original proposition; either the price fixed 50 years ago was grossly high, or it is grossly low now. There is no escape from that proposition. I know that 30 years ago, when I was active in young life, I could live and keep my family respectably on half what I can keep them for to-day, and I believe that is the experience of every man on this floor.

Mr. DIFENDERFER And what were luxuries then are necessities to-day.

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; as my friend from Pennsylvania says, what were luxuries then are almost necessities now. It does not apply to Members of Congress alone, it applies to every department of life. I can remember when a man who got 50 cents a day apparently lived on it as well as he does now. There was a time when Congressmen only got $2,500 a year, and I venture the assertion that they then saved more out of their salaries than does the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.
Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he wants to be understood as saying that the articles which he bought for his family 25 years ago would cost now 50 or 100 per cent more, or, as a matter of fact, very much more?

or, as a matter of fact, very much more;

Mr. PROUTY. Oh, very many of them cost more.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it not a very slight percentage?

Mr. PROUTY. No; I used to buy potatoes for 10 cents a bushel, and I am paying $1 now.

Mr. SLOAN. Perhaps the gentleman ate a great many more than which makes up the difference.

then, which makes up the difference.

Mr. PROUTY. But, Mr. Chairman, laying all jesting aside, there is not a man within the sound of my voice that does not know that 30 years ago he could make a better showing on $1,000 than he can to-day on $5,000. It is not all in the increased cost of the things he burs, but in the increase of things that the situation demands that he and his family should have.

Mr. SLOAN. Is not that all the difference, practically? Mr. PROUTY. No; it is not all of it. The standard of living has been raised all around in every way; and I simply repeat what I said a little while ago, that if it was right 50 years ago it is dead wrong now.

I am not disposed to say that when these salaries were originally fixed there was a conspiracy to rob the Public Treasury. But, Mr. Chairman, I find myself getting more or less diverted from the real thought that I want, if I can, to burn into the minds of at least the few loyal Members of the House who came here this morning to hear me. The time has arrived when we should get information from men that have an interest in it, and not from these fellows around here who make a brokerage out of the salaries of these unfortunate people. Now, if there is no further question, I will proceed to discuss the second thought, the one I really rose to discuss, and that is the ques- railroad corporations?

tion of good roads, the aid of the Federal Government in some way in the improvement of our highway system.

I introduced a bill on this subject some time early in Congress that presented a plan that, of course, met with my own judgment. The provision that will be offered as an amendment to this measure in this House in connection with this bill does not quite meet my own ideas as to the policy the Government should pursue in regard to public roads, but it is so clearly a step in the right direction that I am most glad to give it the benefit of my support.

Of course, the very first question that comes to the mind of every lawyer, and perhaps the mind of every Congressman, is whether or not the Federal Government has the constitutional right to enter upon this field-whether or not it was a part of the policy of the framers of our Constitution that the Federal Government should reach out its hand and supervise and take charge of or assist in the construction of highways. Yesterday you heard upon this floor two quite able discussions on this question, and I do not intend to add much to that part of it. view it, there is no question about the power of the Federal Government. The first section, that enables us to provide for the "general welfare," is ample, because there is no one thing that adds so much to the happiness and prosperity of our people as good roads.

The provision that allows us to provide for the "common defense" would be ample, and under it we could exercise this power, because there is nothing that adds so much to the force and effectiveness of an army as the ability to quickly mobilize.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I have just got started. Gentlemen have taken all of my time in asking questions. I would like to have about 20 minutes more time.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 20 minutes more.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I shall necessarily have to use most of this time myself, although I shall not make the hard and fast rule that I shall not yield to a question, but I hope my friends will not take too much of my time.

We do not need to rely upon these implied powers of the Constitution. Under section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, division 7, the power is expressly conferred upon Congress to "establish post offices and post reads," and Congress itself declared that the word "establish" should be construed in regard to post roads in the same way it is construed in regard to post offices. In other words, there is just as much authority under the Constitution of the United States to establish, maintain, and improve post roads as there is to establish, build, and maintain post offices. I might say here, by way of parenthesis, that for more than 50 years that right was exercised by the Federal Government, and it was never called into question, and to my knowledge it has never been called into question in any tribunal in the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States did construe this question, and confirmed in Congress the right to aid in the construction of railroads under this provision. is a strange mental operation that would say that the Federal Government has power under that article to build railroads that are to be used forever for private purposes and yet has no power to assist in the building, improvement, and furtherance of roads that are forever to be used by the public without compensation on the part of the Federal Government. So I pass that question.

The next question that suggests itself to every thoughtful mind is whether or not the project is of sufficient national importance to justify Congress in taking the funds out of the Federal Treasury and applying them to that purpose. As I look at it, Mr. Chairman, there is no subject pending before the American Congress of greater importance than the question of road Up to 1860 we engaged in Federal aid, but after construction. the close of the war we turned our whole attention to the building of railroads, and the Government of the United States appropriated millions of its money and gave millions of acres of its land and millions of dollars of credit for the purpose of creating transportation by rail. I am not going even now to criticize that, but it looks to me perfectly clear that if the Government considers of enough importance the question of transportation to thus lend its whole Treasury to the scheme, then the initial transportation, which is the greater transportation, should receive the same care and consideration at the hands of the American Congress.

Mr. FORNES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. With pleasure.
Mr. FORNES. Is it not a fact that the Government was paid back the entire amount of money which it ever advanced the amount of expenditure as between the city or the rural dweller. [Applause.]

APRIL 23.

Mr. PROUTY. Of course, that would lead the gentleman and me into a long discussion; but I can answer the question by saying clearly no; and I can easily demonstrate that if I would dare to take it out of my time; but there were 200,000,000 acres of land that were given to them, not $1 of the value of which was ever returned to the Public Treasury. The Agricultural Department says that it is now worth $40 an acre, but at $10 an acre that would amount to two billions of dollars

Mr. FORNES. Is it not a fact regarding that that whatever land was given was amply paid for by the improved value of the land adjoining it? Was it not a business proposition?

Mr. PROUTY. On the part of the railroads; yes.
Mr. FORNES. Another question I wish to ask is Mr. FORNES. Another question I wish to ask is this: It may be constitutional, but is it good policy for the National Government to spend its money for the purpose of improving roads which lie entirely within the State? Is it not a fact that it ought to be the pride of every State to spend its own money in the improvement of its roads? In other words, would not that be proper home rule?

Mr. PROUTY. Every word that the gentleman has said is true, but it would be just as true of railroads as it would be of public highways.

Mr. FORNES. Oh, I beg to differ with the gentleman. Public highways are not international roads.

Mr. BARTLETT. An international road is a public highway.
Mr. PROUTY. If I started to go from here to Chicago by road—as many of my friends are doing by automobile—does the gentleman say that is not interstate traffic and commerce?

Mr. BARTLETT. A railroad is a public highway under the

Mr. FORNES. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that for the luxury of the few we shall have, so to say, to lay the burden on the larger number?

Mr. PROUTY. If the gentleman would just hold himself in patience I shall be very glad to answer that question, because that is the second question that I am going to answer.

Now, I will give three or four minutes to a question of its importance. There is more freight actually hauled by roadby wagon-than there is by the railroads of this country-more actual pounds hauled over the highways of this country than by railroad. In this country it costs, according to the estimates of the director of roads, 23 cents per mile per ton to haul that. In England it costs 11 cents; in Germany it costs 10 cents; in France it costs 7 cents. Now, if you note that, the cost of transportation in those countries is less than half what it is in this country. If you could make our roads as good, so our transportation over the highways could be as cheap as it is in those countries, there would be a saving in this country exceeding all the freight that is paid to all the railroads in the United States.

Mr. FORNES. Will the gentleman yield for another question? Mr. PROUTY. Let me answer the first one, I can not answer all of them at once. After I answer the first one.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CULLOP). The gentleman declines to

Mr. PROUTY. The gentleman will pardon me, I am coming to the second question; the gentleman has not given me chance to answer yet. Anyone who has watched this situation and studied it knows it costs on an average more to haul a ton of freight 8 miles over the country roads than it does to haul it from New York to Liverpool by steam. Again, the average cost of hauling the food products of the farm to the city is greater than the railroad transportation from the point of delivery to the point of final consumption. Therefore the man who has not studied this question with the idea of reducing this initial cost of transportation is not helping to solve the great problem of this country as to how we will get cheap food without reducing the price to the man who raises it. Now, I am going to come to the gentleman's second question, briefly, because you can discuss this ad libitum. There is no limit to the arguments that can be used in this controversy. In regard to the second question, I notice my friend, Mr. Madden, yesterday spent considerable time upon the same question, and that is, whether it is fair. Now, everyone knows that primarily this expenditure will be for the benefit of the inland dweller—the expenditure will be for the beach of the limit of the farmer, so to speak, and it is an expense that comes off the entire community, as everybody can easily recognize. Now, as I have frequently said, and I repeat here now, there is no greater wrong that a legislative body or a government can enact than to perpetually take money from one class of citizens and expend it for the benefit of another. It does not matter much how high taxes are so long as they are expended for the benefit of substantially the same class of people from whom they are collected. I undertake to say that this Congress may pursue the policy that we are advocating for 100 years and we will not be able to equalize or balance the | built and constructed those roads, it is certainly not unfair for

Mr. COX of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield at that juncture? Mr. PROUTY. Just let me finish this and then if the gentleman will call my attention to his question I will be glad to answer it. Now, what is the fact? Take, for example, an illustration. This country has spent $600,000,000 improving the waterways and harbors, and practically every dollar of that money was primarily expended in the cities and for the benefit of the cities along these waterways. Six hundred million dollars has been spent-far more than upon the building of the Panama Canal. I believe I could state with perfect safety that at least 75 per cent—it was so stated in the Senate—had been thrown in the well. Now, of that sum of money the inland dwellers have paid at least 75 per cent and they have never received a direct benefit from a dollar of it. They have received an indirect benefit, just like you fellows who live in the cities are to receive an indirect benefit from the improvements of these highways. I live in a city and I think we can be fair and square, even if we live in a city, and discuss this question as fairly and impartially as those who live on the farms of this country

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? He lives in Des Moines County, I believe. Mr. PROUTY. I live in Des Moines.

Mr. BARTLETT. You have done nothing toward improving your roads there, have you?

Mr. PROUTY. We have no some and are planning more. We have not done much, but we have done

Mr. BARTLETT. You have 900 miles of road and you have improved 53 of it. That is what you have done.

Mr. PROUTY. We do not claim to have macadamized roads; but do not divert me with these technical and unnecessary questions that have no direct bearing on the question I am discussing.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield there for one short question? Mr. PROUTY. Let me finish with the gentleman from New York. He asked me the first question and the longest question, and he is entitled to a fair and square answer. take, for instance, the building of post-office and public buildings. The Government of the United States has spent over $200,000,000 in the cities, every dollar of which has been spent for the accommodation, convenience, and benefit of the city dweller.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And not in the country?

Mr. PROUTY. Not a dollar of it went into the country. I notice my good friend from Illinois [Mr. Madden] yesterday called attention to the fact that they spent—he said $47,000,000, but he has that too high; it is $37,000,000—for rural free delivery in the country for the benefit of the farmer; and there was a loss on that, I will concede. But, gentlemen, remember this fact, that of the total population in this country 54 per cent of it lives in the country and 46 in the cities and that we cent of it lives in the country and 46 in the cities, and that we spend per capita more than three dollars for one in maintaining the Postal Department for the benefit of the dwellers in the city than for the benefit of the dwellers in the country.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to say that the rural mail, of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden] spoke yesterday, while it goes over the rural mail route, it is not altogether for the benefit of the country man, but it is the city man writing to the country man about matters in which the city man is interested, and the rural mail is just as much for the city people as it is for the country people.

Mr. PROUTY. What I am trying to say is this, that this country might begin now on this system of helping to keep the Mr. PROUTY. roads of the country in such a condition as to facilitate the transportation of food products, and otherwise, by the farmers and continue it a long time on the basis of this bill and the account would not be equalized.

Mr. COX of Ohio rose.

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.
Mr. COX of Ohio. Our colleague from New York [Mr. FORNES] made the observation a while ago that the State ought to have considerable pride in keeping up these great highways. Is it not true that the Federal Government likewise should have just as much pride in paying the States for such use as it makes of any city utility, notably the highways? It was never the intent under the Constitution that the States should maintain post roads, because it is clearly a Federal utility.

Mr. PROUTY. I think that is a fair statement of the proposi-But touching upon that same question, if it is fair that the Government should pay the railroads for the transportation of mail over their tracks, after the Government has practically the Federal Government to pay the States for the use of the roads that the States built out of their own money. might just call attention, in this connection, to the fact that up to the present time the Federal Government has used all the highways that have been constructed at the expense of the local governments for the transmission of these mails without paying a cent for it, and yet the Federal Government is paying to those roads that it, in effect, built seven times as much as private individuals or corporations can secure their transportation for their products over the same roads.

Will the gentleman yield for a question? The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr.

PROUTY] yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FORNES]? Mr. PROUTY. With pleasure. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey again if I can have a few minutes more, if these gentlemen take all of my time?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I will yield to the gentleman

10 minutes more.

Mr. PROUTY. I do not need it yet, but I may need it later. Mr. FORNES. Is not a rural mail established for the convenience of the farmers?

Mr. PROUTY. Surely. So are the railroads built for the convenience of your people.

Mr. FORNES. Should the burdens, therefore, be borne by those who derive no benefit, entirely, or should they not be borne by those who are benefited more than by those who are not benefited?

Mr. PROUTY. Let me put this question to you: Ought not these cities along these rivers and harbors which get these vast sums of money pay for that local improvement since they get the great benefit?

Mr. FORNES. I say, decidedly, no; because the greater the shipping facilities the more valuable becomes the land, and the rivers and harbors are improved to increase the shipping facilities, not for the streets in the city, but for the large stretches of land in the country.

I am equally convinced that the improvement Mr. PROUTY. of the public highways in this country would increase every department of commerce as I am that the improvement of the rivers and harbors would.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I suggest to the gentleman, with his permission, this: That the community that may be benefited by this expenditure of money on public roads pays out about seven times as much as it would receive in benefit? And the community that got $15 a mile would probably pay seven times as much to get it.

Mr. PROUTY. As I look at this question, it is a give and Some fellows have been taking and it is time some fellows

Mr. TRIBBLE. That is true with respect to New York, is it not, the city that the gentleman is speaking of, that gets all the money?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes. I am not speaking because I am specially interested in that part of the community, the rural part, because everybody knows that I live in a good-sized city. no man who sits down and takes his pencil and keeps his conscience with him and goes to figuring can help coming to the conclusion that either through importunity or otherwise Congress has taken the funds of the United States and put them in the cities instead of in the country, and the time has arrived when the country farmer has the right to see some of it come back to his own community. [Applause.]
The CHAIRMAN. The 20 minutes' extension of the time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

I would like to have a little more time.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. BARTLETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon for having

Mr. PROUTY. I realize that I can not approximately exhaust this subject that I have in mind, but I will endeavor to contribute one thought if I can, and that is that the Government owes this to her citizenship. Why do we expend these large owes this to her citizenship. Why do we expend these large sums of money in educational affairs? We do not spend them in proportion to the benefits received from the men who pay the We recognize that this Government can not stand, that the Republic can not be perpetuated, without an intelligent citizenship. And I want to say to you that the gravest question now before the American public, in my opinion, is how we can preserve this Republic.

When this Republic was first organized less than 4 per cent of our people lived in the cities. Ninety-six per cent lived in the country. There was clean politics during those times. passed on until 1850, and then there was only 13 per cent living in the cities. In 1890 the percentage had increased to 40 per cent, and by the last census it had increased to 46 per cent. there is not a man within the sound of my voice who does not know that the country parish and the agricultural people are the stay of this Republic. [Applause.]

I have never been so profoundly impressed with that thought as I have been since I have served on one of the Committees on Elections in this House. In connection with my work on that committee I not only had occasion to examine several of these subjects as occurring in the last election, but I have also gone practically through all the precedents that have come to this House, and so far as my reading and observation have gone there is not a single precinct from the agricultural portion of the community in which there has been fraud, ballot-box stuffing, or any of those crimes that strike at the basis of our National Republic. These contaminations come from the large cities, and God save this country if we ever reach a time when a great majority of our citizenship comes from the cesspools of a congested city population. [Applause.]

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to The CHAIRMAN. Does the the gentleman from Wisconsin?

With pleasure. Mr. PROUTY.

Mr. BERGER. How about Adams County, Ohio [laughter], where even the preachers are shown to have accepted money in small sums for their votes? How about West Virginia? How about the rural parts of Wisconsin, my own State?

Mr. PROUTY. Did you notice my proposition? I did not say that no fellow that lived in the country had ever yielded to the temptation of the seductive money sent out from the city. I said that there is not a case recorded of ballot-box stuffing and those ordinary frauds of election in a country district. I admit, sir, that you fellows from the city, with your vast hoards of wealth, can go out and occasionally corrupt a few individuals in the country. [Applause.] If you will read the history of Adams County, you will find that every dollar of that corrupt fund came from the city. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN and Mr. BERGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. BERGER. Does the gentleman accuse us of the inordinate use of money in elections? We have none. Our party is made up of workingmen. The highest wages I ever got was $30 a week. The membership of the Socialist Party finances all its elections without any help or assistance from the outside. [Applause.] Mr. PROUTY.

I was referring chiefly to the Milwaukee I expect the Socialists did not spend accent. [Laughter.] much money to elect the gentleman from Milwaukee, but the gentleman disavow that there was money used to defeat him in Milwaukee?

Mr. BERGER. The Milwaukee accent is the only true accent in the country to-day, accentuating the political and economic necessities of the future. That accent expresses the fears, the hopes, and ambitions of the working class as far as this House is concerned. The wealth of the gentlemen who do the bribing comes from the working class of both the city and the country. It is usually a part of the surplus value taken from the workingmen of the districts where it is used for bribing. It is not money coming from one section of the country and given to the other. It is wealth taken by one class from another class. A small part of this wealth is used to bribe the very class from which it has been taken.

Mr. PROUTY. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question? Does the gentleman believe that politics is as pure in the city as it is in the country?

Mr. BERGER. It is as pure in the class, conscious working class, of Milwaukee as in any country district I ever heard of [Applause.] I have just a slight suspicion that the gentleman never lived in the country and is a stranger to real pure country politics.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Now that we have discovered the man for whom Diogenes was looking with his lautern [laughter], it is in order to ask some questions. Now, can I ask the gentleman this question: Is not Adams County necessary as the exception to prove the rule to which the gentleman just referred a moment ago?

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman-

Mr. SLOAN. I should like to have the answer of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. BERGER. Very well.

Mr. PROUTY. The fact that these gentlemen all think of only one county in the United States, in all its history, is a rather suggestive thing. On the other hand, I could stand here by the hour and point to cases in the cities. If the committee would extend my time I would agree to take the rest of this afternoon in pointing out the specific instances.

Mr. BERGER. I should like to hear the gentleman do that.

It would be mighty interesting.

Mr. PROUTY. But here is what I am trying to impress upon this House, that the stability and purity of our Republic depend upon the fact that we maintain a large per cent of our population in the rural districts. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I will ask the gentleman if George W. Perkins lives in the country? He furnished the campaign funds for one of the presidential candidates.

Mr. PROUTY. Do not let us mix any politics in this. fess I have become thoroughly disgusted with the Members of this House on both sides trying to convert the halls of Congress into a political hustings. [Applause.] I think we should discuss other questions here, questions upon which we can legislate and not questions on which we may differ in politics.

What I wanted to say was this: Whatever will drive from the city and its miasmas a portion of our people and put them in the wholesome, invigorating, moral atmosphere of country life is a matter that should receive the attention of the highest authorities of the Government and the candid support of every man who loves this country and its institutions and desires to perpetuate them. [Applause.]

There is nothing that will do so much to add to the population of the rural districts as the improvement of our highways. Men do not like isolation. Men like to be in communication. You may shout, "Back to the farm; back to the farm," until you are hourse. Men will not go there in the mud and they will not stay there in isolation. You have got to make their conditions pleasant. You have got to help surround them with conditions that will attract them there. You want something that will draw people from the city out into the country. You want something that will keep the farmers' boys on the farm, and there is nothing that will do that like good roads.

The director of roads of the Agricultural Department of this Government took occasion to compile some statistics upon that question. I will only take time to call attention to two specific The director of roads caused 25 counties to be taken indiscriminately, counties in which there were no macadam roads, and during the census period between 1890 and 1900 those counties shrank in population an average of 3,112 persons. He also picked 25 counties indiscriminately where there was a large mileage of improved roads, where 40 per cent of the roads were improved. During that same period of 10 years each of those counties on an average increased in population 31,095 people. You can not point to a better illustration of the beneficial effect of good roads. If we had good roads all over this country we would draw from the cesspools and miasmas of the city enough of our people into the wholesome atmosphere of the country to purify our politics. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Konor] 30 minutes.

Mr. KONOP. Mr. Chairman, it is very seldom that I impose upon the time of this House. In the short space of time that I have in the discussion of this important bill I can only discuss briefly and generally some of the main features of it. And at the outset I want to commend the great Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads for bringing in this bill. Although I do not approve of all the provisions in it, there are so many new and meritorious provisions in it that it commends itself to every American citizen.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a political measure. I agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Prouty] that the consideration of this bill should not be a political matter. No Member of this House should make political capital out of any propositions that are submitted in this bill. It is a business proposition. We are appropriating money for the carrying on of the greatest business enterprise of this great Government. We are appropriating money for its expenses which we hope will be turned back into We are also in a great measure in this bill providing for the regulation of this department. And so I say it should not be made a political measure. Any proposition that is offered under the special rule by way of an amendment or any proposition in the bill should not be treated with a view of making political capital out of it.

To illustrate that this bill is purely a business proposition, and to illustrate its importance as a business proposition, I want to cite you lines 14 and 15, on page 18, where you will find in these two lines this statement:

For inland transportation by railroad route, $47,646,000.

In 14 words of this measure we find we are appropriating nearly $50,000,000 to pay for only a part of this great enterprise. There is nothing more said, and we are simply turning out of the Treasury of the United States the exorbitant sum of $50,000,000.

The chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, in presenting this bill to the House, made the assertion that the express companies of this country are paying the railroads on an average three-quarters of a cent per pound for carrying the express packages, while the railroads are charging the United States Government 5 and 6 cents a pound for carrying the Government mail. And yet, in this bill, in these two lines, we appropriate the sum of nearly $50,000,000, and nothing is said as to whether we are going to in any way regulate as to what contracts shall be made with the railroad companies.

I think that probably some time some law will be placed on the statute books to regulate this proposition. I realize that such a measure would not be in order to be inserted in an appropriation bill. We talk about economy, and we pride ourselves on economizing a little here and a little there, and yet this enormous sum of $47,000,000 is appropriated in two lines and nothing is said about economy; nothing said about the sum we might be able to save. I think we might be able to save from 1 to 2 or 3 and perhaps 10 million dollars on this one provision of the bill.

In the consideration of all these appropriation bills the committees of this House are usually governed by the estimates as they are made. Without reading to you the different estimates of the departments I will insert them in the RECORD:

These estimates show that upward of $700,000,000 is estimated for by the heads of departments for the different committees of the House of Representatives to appropriate the money for carrying on the business of the Government.

Who is it that prepares the estimates? Some department clerk, and that department clerk below refers it to the man ahead, and so on up until finally the head of the particular de-partment approves of the figures and they are sent over to the committees of the House of Representatives. In that way the estimates reach the committees. It is true that the committees of the House of Representatives scrutinize these estimates—it is true that they cut down here and there a few hundred thousand dollars from the estimate—and yet I believe that some different system ought to be devised, so that the committees of this body would know exactly how to cut these estimates down. There ought to be some commission or body that could go and investigate and find out what the needs of the departments really are.

Mr. Chairman, by a special rule, adopted on last Thursday, certain great questions were made in order by way of amendment to this bill. I know there is not a man on the floor of this House who would not be happier if he did not have to vote on some of these propositions, and I confess that I would be unusually happy myself.

The first proposition made in order by the special rule is one providing for steel mail cars or steel underframes for mail cars or equally indestructible material. I do not think there can be any opposition to that provision in the bill. We all know that mail cars on trains are next to the tender of the locomotive, and in case of a wreck the wooden mail car is the one that is usually smashed to splinters. The loss of life in the railway mail clerk service has been appalling, and it is high time that this provision is made by the railroad companies to protect human lives. Having fresh in our minds the recent terrible disaster at sea should spur us on to provide speedily by law for the protection of life and limb by all public-service carriers. would be nothing less than criminal to shut our eyes to this reckless slaughter of life on land and sea when it can be avoided. That it will necessitate an extra expenditure of money on the part of the railroad companies to provide steel mail cars is true. That to amply provide for safety at sea will mean extra expenditure is equally true. But we must not place money above human life. We must not measure life by dollars. If we can save one human life by providing steel mail cars, we have saved more than the price of them all.

Under the special rule adopted, sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, as they appear in the pending bill, are in order.

The purpose of section 2 is plain. It protects the Government from hidden.

from bidders who have entered into a combination to fleece the department. Section 3 provides for the giving of bonds by Navy mail clerks and assistants. Section 4 relates to the weighing of mail

Section 5 provides for an 8-hour day for certain letter carriers and not to exceed 10 consecutive hours of work. It is also provided that in cases where the service requires an excess of 8 hours there should be extra compensation for the excess. The committee certainly ought to be congratulated for this provision. There certainly ought to be no public servant of any Government who should be required to work more than 8 hours a day. I think the time is not far distant when employers of labor all over the world will accede to the demand of labor for an 8-hour day.

Section 6, I think, treats of one of the most important matters in this bill. It gives every man in the postal service a chance to be heard in case of any charges against him which warrant his discharge. It also abolishes the much-spoken-of "gag rule," which was so forcibly introduced by the "Big Stick" and so tenaciously adhered to by his successor until very recently, in order to fully carry out the so-called Roosevelt policies. All this was done in a free country. It is strange that Congress has not abolished these despotic orders before. The humblest laborer in private employ is usually apprised of the reasons for his discharge. Even the meanest criminal is not denied the right to have specific charges preferred against him and a chance to be heard. And in this country to think for one moment that men in the public service should be denied the right to be heard would mean the denial of citizens their rights as citizens. Any man in public service should have a right as a citizen to know why he is discharged from public duty, and as a citizen should certainly have a chance to be heard. This is a citizen should certainly have a chance to be heard. This is nothing but fairness and justice. It is a right inherent in every American citizen. To be heard in defense against any accusation is a fundamental right of American citizenship. to be an inherent and fundamental right in every country. For years American citizens under civil service in this free country have been denied the right to be heard. By a "gag rule" they have been denied any right to complain and present their petitions and grievances. They had to submit, like slaves, to the orders of superiors. I do not believe that an American citizen when he enters the civil service should by that act lose his right as an American citizen Such a rule, instead of promoting discipline and efficiency, produces the worst kind of tyranny, and that the postal clerks of this country have so long submitted and that the American Congress has so long permitted such a rule of despotism to prevail in this country is beyond comprehension.

Section 7 provides for a reclassification of railway postal It provides 10 grades, at salaries ranging from $900 to I do not know much about classification, but I believe that in the civil service to-day there are too many classes in classifications. I believe that there ought to be less classes and more pay provided for those in the lowest class. Upon investigation in the different departments we will find that those in the lowest classes do most of the work and get the least pay. In our plan of economy it would be wiser to economize by decreasing the salaries of those at the heads of the departments and pay a living wage to those who do the work.

Section 8, which has been made in order, provides for a rural parcel post and also for the appointment of a commission to investigate the feasibility and propriety of establishing a general parcel post. If I understand rightly the provision for a rural parcel post, it ought to be amended so as to provide for a complete rural parcel post. As it now reads, it provides for the delivery of packages on those routes only on which they are collected, so that a carrier on route "A" can not collect a package to be delivered on route "B," starting from the same office. If this is to be the provision of the law, when the time comes if no one offers an amendment I shall offer one providing that packages may be delivered on all routes starting from the same office. If this is not amended, it will only benefit those merchants who have their places of business at the place where the post office is. For example, suppose that a country store-keeper, who resides at an intermediate point on route "A," keeper, who resides at an intermediate point on route "A," has an order from a farmer who lives at an intermediate point on route "B," it will be impossible, under the provision in the bill as it now stands, for this country storekeeper to have this package delivered by rural carrier to the farmer on route "B." I think that the rate provided for carrying parcels on rural routes is unreasonably high.

Now, as to the proposition of providing a commission to investigate the feasibility and propriety of the establishment of a general parcel post, I do not believe that this commission will do any good. All such a commission would do would be to take testimony for and against parcel post. As the matter now stands, such testimony would be nothing more than cumulative. We have had enough testimony on this subject. We know the operation of parcel post in other countries. It takes no com-mission to ascertain facts about its operation in those countries. The proper way to determine the practicability is to start in the same way as we started our rural free delivery. way is to authorize the Postmaster General to establish a general parcel post in different sections of the country, and in a year's time of its practice we can find out more about its practicability and feasibility than by investigations by commissions. If we can not have a general parcel post nor postal express, why, then, let us at least have an experiment of it and find out something definite as to its practicability. I think that instead of a commission, if an appropriation, say, of $100,000 were made and the Postmaster General authorized to start in different sections of the country a system of general parcel post that inside of a year we could find out more about the practicability and the feasibility and advisability of extending the system throughout the entire Nation than in any other way. We would have something practical, but if we have a commission simply to take evidence and investigate, we would have simply evidence. have enough evidence on the subject as it is. I have here a book which contains explanations of the system of parcel post of every country in the world, and I do not see what more information such a commission can give us. So I say that I think that the better plan would be to experiment in this matter, experiment as you did with the rural-delivery proposition. started one route and then started another, and we started them in the East and in the West, until to-day this entire country is covered with a network of rural routes. If we are to have any system at all, if the Government is to go into the parcel-post business, the best way to find out whether we want a parcel post is to start, as I say, an experimental parcel post, say, for instance, in New England, and see how it works and then take a section in another part of the country and start it there, and at the end of the year the Postmaster General can give us some substantial information on the practicability and the feasibility of the subject of a general parcel post.

Mr. Chairman, why this demand for a parcel post on the part of a great majority of American citizens? Why, on the other hand, such a determined opposition from a large number of citizens? On the one hand it is charged that the express companies are opposing parcel post, and Members of this body, if they oppose parcel post, are accused of being in league with the express companies. On the other hand, it is charged that the catalogue houses are back of the movement for a parcel post, and that Members of this House who favor parcel post are in league with the great catalogue houses. Neither accusation is true. Members of this House who favor a parcel post do so because they honestly believe in it, and those Members who oppose a parcel post are just as honest and sincere in not believing in it.

The analysis of arguments for and against a general parcel post is probably best stated by the committee, on pages 8 and 9 of the report:

One of the most difficult questions connected with proposed postal progress arises with the suggestion to create a general unlimited parcel post for the transportation of merchandise at a flat rate of 8 cents a pound or less, with a limit of 11 pounds or a greater number of pounds. The advocates of this proposition insist that the rate on fourth-class matter (merchandise) was at one time 8 cents a pound with no loss of revenue, but an increase of revenue; that the zone system of transportation charges used by the express companies is unnecessary and cumbersome; that express companies pay wheelage to railroad companies and divide profits and still make annually colossal profits at the expense of the people; that it is the right of the people to use the mails for their own benefit and the right of the consumer to buy wherever he can secure the best bargain, whether it be at home or in another State or city, and that the complaint of this view is from selfish sources; that a largely increased revenue will come to the Government from the system and advantages and blessings to the whole people in its operation.

The opponents of a general unlimited parcel post insist that it will tend to concentrate business in the large cities and be injurious to rural communities and small towns and cities; that it is a step in the wrong direction—paternalistic and dangerous in its tendencies; that it would create an enormous deficit in the Post Office Department; that it would revolutionize the commercial system in the United States; that it would seriously delay the delivery of legitimate mail; that it would deplete or destroy the prosperity of innumerable country towns and villages, and therefore must be regarded as a menace to the welfare of all the people; that it is class legislation in that it discriminates against the country merchant and favors the great retail mail-order houses; that it is in effect a subsidy to the retail mail-order houses—wrong in principle and anfair in practice; and they further insist that a rural parcel post would be an entering wedge for a general parcel post.

The most of people living in the country and engaged in agriculture and other pursuits, so far as we can secure information, and the larger mercantile establishments in the great cities favor an unlimited parcelpost law. The country merchant and nearly all merchants of the smaller cities and towns oppose the law. This seems to be the alignment. Self-interest, the mainspring of most of our actions, seems to be commanding in both factions. We do not think that the advantages claimed for the establishment of this post will be so great as its ultra-friends claim, nor that the disadvantages would be nearly so great as its enemies fear.

Mr. Chairman, the question of parcel post is nothing but a

Mr. Chairman, the question of parcel post is nothing but a question of transportation rates. For years the express companies of this country have been charging the people exorbitant rates for the transportation of parcels and packages. average express charge in this country is $31.20 per ton, while the average freight charge is $1.90 per ton. This makes a ratio In other countries the ratio of average express charges to average freight charges is from 3 to 1 to 9 to 1. I will insert in here a table compiled in Senate Document 379, on page 11, which shows the ratio of average express charges to average freight charges in 11 countries:

Ratios of average express charges to average freight charges in 11 countries.

What merchant has not complained of these exorbitant express rates? What man who has paid an express charge on a package has not stood amazed at the unreasonable charge? general parcel-post bill will not completely solve this problem. This Government can not, under present charges that the railroads are making for carrying our mails, compete with the express companies. As I said before, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in his speech presenting this bill, made the statement that the railroad companies are carrying parcels for the express companies at an average of three-fourths of a cent per pound, while at the same time they are charging the Government as high as 5 and 6 cents per pound for carrying the mails. The Government can not compete with the express companies under such unfavorable conditions. The Government would get the long haul and lose, and the express companies will get the short haul and make more profit.

I believe that the solution of this transportation problem lies in the propositions as proposed by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Maryland. The proposition is to eliminate the competition of express companies by taking them over. This system that they propose, the system of postal express, is the best solution of the problem. This will not only benefit the farmer and laborer, but it will also benefit the country store-It will give quick and adequate transportation for small shipments equally to all. Mr. Chairman, I heartly favor the proposition of postal express. I believe it is far superior to any parcel post that we may adopt, and it being in order under the special rule, I shall vote for it.

Mr. WILLIS. I am very much interested in the gentleman's discussion of this subject, and before he leaves this particular part of it, I would like to know what plan he has in mind for the financing of this project. How much money would it cost to take over the express companies? How is all that to be cared for? It seems to me that is important,

Mr. KONOP. I have not investigated the matter, but I am informed the total assets of the express companies are in the neighborhood of $30,000,000

LEWIS. May I venture to answer the gentleman's question; may I take so much of the gentleman's time?

Mr. KONOP. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. There is naturally considerable curiosity as to that phase of the proposition. The express companies, according to the latest report, have an aggregate capitalization of about $200,000,000. Of that $200,000,000 about $160,000,000 represent investments in railroads and other companies, and about $40,000,000, according to their own statement, will be capital of any kind devoted to the express business. Of the $40,000,000 they claim about $10,000,000 for franchise and good will. reference to that item, I may say that express companies have no franchises whatever. A franchise represents a grant of a privilege, usually exclusive in its nature, from the sovereign power, the State or the Government, to some persons, corporate or otherwise. They have no such grant of a privilege, or, for example, the right to lay rails on a street or pipes under the street or wires below or under the street. Therefore, franchise value is entirely eliminated from the proposition. With reference to entirely eliminated from the proposition. good will, the law of eminent domain seems to settle that question. Good will is not an item to be considered in condemnation proceedings in the way of compensation to which the party may be entitled, and court authorities may be adduced and will be adduced for that proposition.

Finally analyzed, there seems only one artificial value that the Government might have to make payment in taking over the express property. That artificial value is an item of about $5,000,000, which is said to represent advanced payments by the express companies to the railways to obtain their contracts. I do not think personally even those advanced payments are proper obligations, because they represent in a sense a compounding of an offense between the express company and railway, namely, the granting of exclusive transportation privileges in contravention of the Federal and the common law as long as they have been known.

I beg the gentleman's pardon for consuming so much of his time. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield for me to ask another question of the gentleman from Maryland? Now, the gentleman stopped just at the point where I wanted him to go on. As I get it, there are about $30,000,000 that will be involved? involved?

Mr. LEWIS. Not over $20,000,000, according to the latest report. And even if the good will and franchise claimed by them were admitted, not over $30,000,000.

Mr. WILLIS. Say it is $30,000,000. Then it is proposed that the bonds of the Government shall be sold to raise this Is that the idea? amount.

Mr. LEWIS. This bill does not so provide, but the bill reported favorably by the Commerce Committee makes it a charge upon the Treasury to be paid by the Treasury as the awards are found.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, the gentleman knows it is quite evident that the revenues are not in such a state as to permit immediate payment. It would be necessary, I take it, to issue bonds and increase the bonded debt to that extent.

Mr. LEWIS. But the act of payment would not develop until a year or two hence, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question? I would like to inquire whether-

Mr. WILLIS. But we must prepare for all of these things

Senate now will provide for that.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KONOP. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Yes, co. (1) Mr. SHACKLEFORD. This excise bill that is pending in the

Mr. COX of Ohio. You fix the sum of $30,000,000. Is that determined in your mind by the valuation of certain physical assets the express companies now have that we ought to have in carrying out this utility, or is that a sum fixed in your mind by a certain sense of equity that we ought to pay to the express companies?

Mr. LEWIS. It is a sum fixed definitely by the inventories and statements made by the express companies to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BORLAND. I have here the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the express companies, and in the hearings before the Subcommittee on the Post Office and Post Roads Committee is given the value of the real property and equipment of the express companies, and for the year 1908 it is $23,000,000, of which only $7,300,000 is cars, horses, equipment, and vehicles. So of the $14,000,000 there is probably a large amount that would not be available for the Government's use.

When we come to the year 1909 the total value of the equipment is $9,234,000.

Mr. COX of Ohio. But we are not required to take it over?

Mr. BORLAND. I think a large amount of that real estate will be found to be business property in large cities that can be left in the hands of the express companies-property that is like railroad investments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Konor] has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, since I am responsible for consuming so much of the gentleman's time

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Konor] has expired, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] has control of the time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Konor].

Mr. KONOP. I thank the gentleman from Maryland, and he can use the balance of my time to answer questions after I am through.

I want to say something about section 9, which provides for the compensation of rural carriers at $1,074 per annum on a route 24 miles in length, and the sum of $44.75 per mile per annum on a route of greater length than that. Rural carriers have to perform their service in all kinds of weather. They have to maintain their equipment and repairs, and also, in the northern parts of this country, they have to endure the elements, the snow, and everything else. So I think they are poorly paid, and I do not think there ought to be a rural carrier in this country that ought to get less than $100 a month.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. KONOP. I will. Mr. HAMLIN. Has the gentleman's attention been called to this fact, that the department in charge of the rural work conthis fact, that the department in charge of the rural work construe the present law always against the interest of the man who carries the mail. To illustrate, they will make a route 26 miles long, but pay the carrier only that which he would get for 24 miles. But if it drops below 24 miles his pay drops to the next lowest point. If you will just permit a word, I will say that this last week I sought to have two different routes readjusted. In order to do it it would bring them both within the 24-mile limit. One carrier was then traveling a fraction over 26 miles. They refused to do it because it would increase the pay to the Government $100 a year, but they would make the fellow carrying mail on the 26-mile route carry it for the same money that they would have to pay him on the 24-mile route rather than to pay $100 by extending the other route. So I say they seem to construe the law always against the fellow who carries the mail, and it is not fair.

Mr. KONOP. Undoubtedly that is true.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the provision regarding the high-ays. The provision for the improvement of rural highways is as follows:

ways. The provision for the improvement of rural highways is as follows:

That for the purpose of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 0 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upcu which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpo— of transporting rural mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any co tody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913.

For a long time the highways of the States and other subdivisions have been used for carrying United States mail, and not one cent has been paid by the General Government for their use. We are paying millions every year to the railroads and yet pay nothing for the use of the rural mail roads. I think if this provision is incorporated in this bill it will be a great incentive to building good roads.

In 1909 the total mileage of public roads in the United States was 2,199,645 miles. Of this only 190,476 miles, or about 8½ per cent of the total mileage, was improved. From these figures it clearly appears that our roads need improvement. Thus far the General Government of the country has spent nothing for the General Government of the country has spent nothing for road building, nor has it paid anything for their use by the Post Office Department. France, which has the best system of roads in the world, has spent $613,000,000 on that system. While, owing to the great distances, this country would have to spend much more, probably $2,000,000,000, but this expenditure would not need to be made at once. This expenditure when spread over a period of 10 or 20 years does not amount to so much each year. Under the plan proposed by this amendment we are not proposing to go into the road-building business, but we are not proposing to go into the road-building business, but we are simply providing for pay for the use of the improved roads. Suppose all of the 190,476 miles of improved roads in the United States were in class A, and suppose that all of this improved mileage was used by the Post Office Department, the Government, for the use of the 190,476 miles of improved roads, would pay the sum of $4,761,900. But there are very few miles of road in this country that come under class A, and not all the improved roads are used by the rural carriers. Deducting for these conditions, I believe it would cost the Government less than $1,000,000 for use of roads, but this provision would be an incentive to the making of improvements by States and counties worth billions of dollars.

But, Mr. Chairman, under the plan we are now proposing we are not going to build post roads, although we have the constitutional power to do so. We are going to stimulate the building of good roads. We are going to pay what we ought to pay for the use of the roads that are built up by the rural communities, the counties, the towns, and the States; and, so I say, if this provision is put into the bill it will be a great incentive to the building of good roads.

The last proposition made in order by the special rule is as

That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons or association or corporation to enter or to have entered into the mails of the United States any newspaper, magazine, or other periodical of like kind unless such publication shall have plainly printed in a conspicuous place therein the name or names of the managing editor or managing editors, the name or names of the publisher or publishers, and the name or names of the owner or owners, including all stockholders owning stock of the par value of $500 or more, of such periodical publication. Any person, association, or corporation who shall violate any provision of this act shall be punished, for each violation of any provision thereof, by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000.

This provision simply ovtends our publicity logication. The

This provision simply extends our publicity legislation. newspapers and magazines, which are such a factor in molding public opinion on public questions, ought to disclose who their owners are. If campaign committees and candidates for public office should disclose the source of the money for campaign expenses, why should not the newspapers and magazines, whose editorials have a greater influence over the campaign than the distribution of money? In this day, when men in public life and candidates for office are so much lauded and so much criticized by the press, is it not but fair to the reading public that it may know who is directing the praise and who is doing the criticizing? [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Littlepage having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, anonunced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bill of the following title

H. R. 21170. An act granting to the El Paso & Southwestern Railroad Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the Territory and State of Arizona, a right of way through the Fort Huachuch Military Reservation in the State of Arizona, and authorizing said corporation and its successors or assigns to construct and operate a railway through said Fort Huachuca Military Reservation, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 836. An act for the relief of Joel J. Parker;

S. 3116. An act to amend sections 1 and 2 of the act of Congress of June 22, 1910, entitled "An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands," so as to include State land selections, indemnity school and educational lands;

S. 3607. An act to direct the Attorney General to take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from a decree entered by the circuit court of the United States in and for the southern district of New York in the suit of the United States v. The American Tobacco Co. and others, and extend the time for taking such appeal, and for other purposes; and

S. 3846. An act to authorize a waiver of trial by jury in the district courts of the United States.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] is recognized.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to enter my protest against conditions as they exist in the railway postal service. There are no more faithful servants of the Government than the railway mail postal clerks. No class of men put in more hours, undertake greater hazards, or are as poorly paid, considering all conditions, as the railway postal clerk. The treatment he all conditions, as the railway postal clerk. receives in some divisions is a disgrace to the department and deserves the censure of every man who wants to see fair and honorable treatment given the Government's employees. In the first place his employment ought to be made as safe for him as possible. The old wooden-box postal cars, attached to the engine and tender and reenforced by a heavy passenger car of steel construction makes the postal car the recipient of all danger in ordinary accidents. The extravagant rental price the Government pays for these wooden boxes called railway postal cars ought to command the most efficient and best built steel cars that could possibly be made. I am aware that there is a requirement that the road shall equip the service with steel cars by 1917. The limit of time when that act was passed ought to have been reduced.

As to compensation, no one will dispute the fact that there is more required of a postal clerk than of any other person in the He must have a greater range of accurate knowledge of train schedules, connections, and so forth, than any other Not only must be have the proper knowledge so as to make the best connections under all conditions on his own road, but he must have knowledge of schedules on distant connecting He must also have knowledge of how to make the best connections in throwing mail in traveling both directions on his own road. For instance, he may be able to reach a certain town on a connecting line by throwing for a certain road in going west, while in going east on his road it may be necessary, because of a change of schedule, to throw the mail for the same town to an entirely different line. These facts are not generally known to the public. Little accurate knowledge reaches the public as to the requirements of the postal clerk.

The pay is inadequate—not in keeping with the services performed and not in keeping with the wages paid in other lines of postal work. Let me illustrate. Girls in second-class post offices acting as stamp clerks are able, if they have been in the service some time and have had the promotions the law anticipates they will be entitled to, sit on a chair and exchange stamps for cash, simply a mechanical process, requiring no ability except that necessary to make correct change; no mental strain, no long hours, not subjected to the loss of life by accident, and get more money for it without incurring any danger than a postal clerk gets after years of service.

I invite the attention of the House to some of the hardships postal clerks have to submit to in the fifth division. I represent a district through which a very large percentage of the transcontinental lines pass and have some knowledge of the conditions that exist. I do not base any criticism on my own information, which, of course, is hearsay, but I am including in these remarks an extract from a letter written by one of the postal clerks on the Pennsylvania system. I have many letters from postal clerks that corroborate this statement. This letter is of very recent date, written from Chicago, and, among other things, contains the following complaint:

I am forced to say that the conditions in the fifth division are anything but promising. Our superintendent at Cincinnati, Ohio, does not appear to have any mercy or soul. He is using the lash at every turn, creating strife in the ranks, and trying to force two days' work out of every man for his own glory, not for the good of the service rendered to the people. The following are some of the requirements that are not in force on some of the other divisions: First. Requiring men to move to terminals, either to Chicago or Pittsburgh, where rent is so high and living so costly that we can not make a decent living. Second. Requiring examinations to be thrown in larger sections so as to increase the difficulty of passing and consequently decrease the promotion. Third. Holding up promotions so as to keep down expense of running the system. Fourth. Working the men in the terminal office while they should be at rest. For example, men who worked all night on a run from Pittsburgh to Chicago were required to work six hours in the terminal office following the arrival of the train. Fifth. Men on the postal service out of Pittsburgh at 3 p. m. arrive in Chicago at 7.30 a. m. the next day, 16½ hours of continuous labor, all the time on their feet, and then required to work 6 hours additional at the terminal. Sixth. The fact is that the mail is carried sometimes three times over the road before it is finally discharged, and this because there are not men enough working the 17-hour trips to distribute it, and all for the glory of the retrenchment of the present postal system.

The charges or complaints in the sections I have quoted are not made by a single individual, but by a number of efficient employees whom I know. I do not believe this Government, administered by careful and efficient men, would permit the injustice to employees above set out if it shall have accurate and definite knowledge that these conditions exist. I am confident that many Members of the House are able, through their correspondence with postal clerks, to substantiate the charges made by the faithful servant from whose letter I have made these extracts. The Government can not lightly pass by these complaints. A complete reorganization of the postal system is necessary if exact justice is to be done to all classes employed in the postal service.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Borland].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Borland].

LAND] is recognized.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the proposal to include in the pending postal bill a provision for the establishment of a parcel post opens the entire subject of the relation of carriage of merchandise to the postal service. It is apparent that there is a distinction between the carriage of intelligence and the carriage of merchandise. Postal service was established and has always been maintained primarily for the purpose of conveying intelligence. Such transportation of merchandise as it has engaged in has been of minor and incidental character, not sufficient to have any appreciable effect upon any branch of the transportation business. In the transportation of intelligence, speed and convenience are the controlling elements; distance plays an important part, but bulk and value are of less consequence. In a great Republic such as ours, the successful conduct and perpetuity of which rests upon the intelligence of its citizens, their acquaintance with public affairs and the needs of the country and their unity of interest, commercial and political, it is difficult to overestimate the importance of the great functions of the Postal Department in the transmission of intelligence and the wide diffusion of knowledge. Whether the message be of a private or public character, it is of the highest importance to the Nation as a whole that it should be within the reach of every citizen, however remote his dwelling or humble his station. We therefore do not count the individual cost of the transmission of a letter. The expense involved is not determined so much by weight and distance as it is by the amount of labor and handling which each piece of mail receives. The principles underlying the postal service, the great agency for the transmission of public and private intelligence, are radically different from those underlying the business of transportation of merchandise. When we approach the problem of transportation of merchandise we must approach it upon principles new to the postal service, but not new to the business world.

The pending bill makes three changes in the provisions for the carriage of parcels:

First. The rate of fourth-class matter is reduced from 16 cents to 12 cents a pound, except as to packages originating upon and destined to points on the same rural route.

Second. It increases the limit of weight on fourth-class matter from 4 pounds to 11 pounds.

Third. It provides that on packages originating on and destined to points on the same rural route a special low rate of 5 cents the first pound and 2 cents each succeeding pound, or a total of 25 cents for the maximum weight of 11 pounds, shall prevail. The first two changes will probably have very little effect in practice and will not materially increase the extent or earnings of the postal business. It is said in a general way that they remove an anomaly now existing growing out of the difference between the postal regulations of this country in its domestic business and the regulations which it has adopted on foreign business in conformity with the Interna-tional Postal Union. Under the agreement with the International Postal Union a package may be mailed between any of the countries parties to that union at the rate of 12 cents a pound and with a maximum weight of 11 pounds. Thus a privilege seemed to be extended to foreign packages which was not extended to domestic packages. As a matter of fact, however, the only use ever made of such rate was for the transmission of Christmas parcels and other noncommercial transactions. It had no effect whatever upon general commerce for the simple reason that the rate is too high to justify any class of business men in making use of it in ordinary trade. cents a pound is $1.32 for an 11-pound package, even though the distance were only a few miles. This is at the rate of $240 a ton, when the average express charges are only $31.50 a ton and the average freight charges about $1.90 per ton. It is hardly to be supposed that even the reduction of the rate from 16 cents to 12 cents will result in any packages being moved whose weight is greater than 2 or 3 pounds. From a weight of 5 pounds upwards the rate is almost universally cheaper by express.

The establishment of a flat rate of 12 cents a pound, whether the distance be 1 mile or 3,000 miles, violates, however, every economic law relating to transportation, as well as all teachings of experience. In the transportation of merchandise rates must be graded according to distance, weight, and value. A flat rate, which disregards all these essential factors except a crude division on weight, is unscientific, unjust, and, in the long run, impractical. The rate is too high for a short haul and too low for a long haul. It is assumed by the hasty thinker that the loss on the long shipment will be made up by the overcharge on the short shipment, and thus an average of receipts will be struck that will enable the Government to conduct the business without loss. In practice no such average will occur. The Post Office will get the long shipments that it offers to carry at a loss, and will not get the short shipments, except in the incidental cases where convenience overbalances the question of rates. Moreover, it is neither honest nor wise in the transportation business to make one man pay the loss on another man's shipment. A flat rate on shipments must be abandoned at the very outset. As has been pointed out repeatedly in this debate a flat rate can not move traffic. is no such thing as a flat rate for moving traffic as a competitive matter in the transportation business. When these gentlemen have gone before the Post Office Committee and talked about the parcel posts of Europe, all of them have left out of sight the fact that the only country in Europe that has anything approaching a flat rate is Great Britain, with a very small and compact territory, and her rate is 6 cents a pound, whereas ours is 12 cents. How much that affects the transportation business of Great Britain I do not know, but Germany, which has been referred to so frequently, has the zone system and a graduated scale of charges.

The third change, however, proposing the establishment of a rural parcel post, and which I understand is the recommendation of the Postmaster General, is the most vicious element of the bill. It has often been said by zealous advocates of parcel post that the only reason why Congress did not inaugurate such a system was the influence of the express companies. In other words, parcel post has been treated as a measure of relief from express charges and a direct competition with such companies. It has been said that there are four main reasons why Congress did not pass a parcel post bill; one was the American Express Co., another the United States Express Co., the third the Adams Express Co., and the fourth the Wells, Fargo Express Co. I am sure I voice the sentiments of the majority of this House, especially the new majority of the Sixty-second Congress, when I say that we would welcome an opportunity to vote upon any proposition to reduce the exorbitant charges of the express companies and to place better and cheaper transportation facilities in the hands of the business men of the country. shall be glad to see real competition with the express companies. but what shall I say of the rural parcel post? It is apparent at a glance that it does not compete with the express companies. for it is expressly confined to traffic over a rural route. In effect it enlarges the territory of the express companies, reserving to them all of the business which they now have at their current rates and providing for a substantial increase of that business without cost to themselves by extending their service to territory which they are at present unable to reach. A brief study will convince any business man that the express companies have no reason to oppose, and are not opposing, the rural parcel post; in fact, that they will be the chief beneficiaries.

In discussing this matter nearly a year ago in the columns of a western trade journal, I took the position that the rural parcel post could be utilized by the express companies, and, through them, by the mail-order houses, to a much greater extent than by any other class of business men. I pointed out that it would be possible for a mail-order house to send a large package by express to some country town which was the beginning of several radiating rural routes and that on arrival the package could be broken up, probably by simply taking off the outer wrapper. into several small packages of less than 11 pounds, which would be properly addressed and ready for remailing out on the rural route, and that this remailing could be done by some young agent, engaged in other business, whose charge for the service would be nominal.

But it seems that the rural parcel post is to be connected up with the express companies by an act of Congress without any expense or delay whatever. The condition is to be much more favorable to the express companies than I had originally supposed. I find upon the calendar of this Congress H. R. 12810, reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Com-merce, entitled "A bill regulating charges for transportation of parcels by express companies engaged in interstate commerce." The first section of this bill establishes maximum rates for express charges; which rates, however, will be found upon investigation to be uniformly higher than the existing rates.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman mean to say that the bill reported fixes charges higher than the present charges of the express companies?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I undertake to say so.
Mr. BARTLETT. I do not undertake to dispute it, because I do not know. I am asking the question for information, and am surprised at the statement.

Mr. BORLAND. That is my judgment about it.
Mr. HAMLIN. I will say that I am not enamored of that bill, but my colleague is unquestionably sadly mistaken if he thinks that the maximum charges fixed in the Adamson billdoes the gentleman refer to the Adamson bill?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman is sadly mistaken if he thinks that the maximum charges in that bill are higher than the existing express rates. He never was more mistaken in his

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is a member of the committee, and probably very thoroughly informed on that subject. I am glad he takes that position, and I will assume that to be

Mr. HAMLIN. The bill makes a reduction of something like 40 per cent.

Mr. BORLAND. Let us assume that it makes a reduction of something like 40 per cent in express charges. What I want to call attention to particularly is section 2 of that bill, which reads as follows:

rends as follows:

Sec. 2. That any person delivering to any agent or office of any express company in the United States any parcel at the time under the law maliable on rural routes plainly addressed to any person or in care of any person on any rural mall route, the initial post office of which is at or in the same town, village, or city with any express office of any express company, may pay in advance both the proper express charges and the United States postage required to carry such parcel on the rural mail route. On arrival at the terminal express office of the same or any connecting express company where originates the mail route to which the parcel is directed, the agent at such office shall mail such parcel, paying the proper postage thereon. Likewise any person on any rural route, the initial post office of which is in the same town, city, or village with any express office, may, in addition to paying the postage appropriate on any parcel at the time under the law maliable on rural routes addressed and mailed to any person at any express office in the United States, pay to the rural letter carrier the proper express charges thereon to the point of destination, whereupon it shall be the duty of such rural letter carrier upon his return to his initial post office to deliver such parcel to the express office and prepay the express thereon.

It shall be the duty of the postmasters and the express agents to execute receipts to conform to this provision.

This bill, taken in connection with the provisions of the postoffice bill, make together a complete plan whereby the rural carrier is to be made the receiving and delivering agent for the express companies without cost or expense to them. The country merchant, who has been told that the purpose of establishing rural parcel post was to enable him to send goods to his customers on the rural routes running out from his town, will study this beautiful scheme with some attention. I have no hesitation in saying that it is vicious in principle and can not fail to be vicious in practice.

If that is not an enlargement of the express business by making the rural free-delivery carrier the collecting and distributing agent of the express companies, I can not possibly frame the sentence in different language. It takes the express companies by the hand and says, "Gentlemen, here are the rural free-delivery carriers of America who are hereby constituted your receiving and delivery agents without expense to you. It is their duty to collect packages for you, collect the money in advance, bring them to the nearest express office, and send them to the party addressed."

But the farmer can not send his mail packages from the rural delivery route through the United States mail to any other delivery or post office in the United States without paying a higher rate of postage. If he undertakes to send it off from his rural delivery route he must use the express companies, according to this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Even with a loop or connecting route.

Mr. BORLAND. Even with a loop or connecting route.

Now, as my time is limited, I will not spend any more time on that. I want to say that this rural delivery can not be justified at all either to the farmer or the country merchant, and there never was a proposition of that character so plainly indefensible as that.

From the state of public opinion on this subject it is evident that there is a widespread demand for some real relief in the transportation of small parcels. This demand grows out of present conditions, and is a real demand that must be met. It must be met, however, upon some scientific and businesslike basis which recognizes the inherent factors of the problem. It is not easy to compare the parcel-post systems in other countries with a rude imitation proposed in this country. Neither is it always possible to compare the railroad conditions in other countries with those of the United States. The first thing to determine is the inherent difference between the small parcel business and the larger business involved in the carriage of the heavier commodities. That there is some inherent difference is manifest from the existence of the express companies as separate concerns. A small parcel presents certain elements which do not enter into the bulkier trade. The first of these is speed. Promptness of delivery is always a desirable and often a necessary element of the carriage of small packages. In this respect it brings itself into some relation with the postal system. The second element is convenience, by which is meant the forwarding of the package to its ultimate destination over the lines of successive carriers, if necessary, by the same general agent. This shows at once why the express business is not an adjunct of the railway business in this country, whatever may be the case in foreign countries. The very existence of the express companies is made necessary by the demand for the convenience of one agency operating over a large number of transportation lines. The third element which gives rise to express business, as distinguished from freight business, is that of value. The care and protection which can be given to an express package is frequently the greatest element in inviting this transportation.

Even after nearly three-fourths of a century of experience in American railroading it is still impossible even for an expert to determine what is a reasonable railroad rate upon any commodity. I do not mean by this that it is altogether guesswork, but it is only in recent years that the railroads themselves have begun serious attempts to secure scientific rates and classifica-The prime necessity in order to run a railroad is to get freight to carry, and the first thing, therefore, for the new railroad or for the railroad entering into new territory is to determine what commodities can be hauled in and out of that territory and to make a rate which will move the stuff. As soon as the freight begins to move the rallway managers then begin to change their plan of operation and to adopt as rapidly as may be what some of them have called the cardinal principle of rate making, namely, to charge all the traffic will bear. The counteracting force of these two principles has produced The rate must be sufficiently low to move all railroad rates. the highest amount of traffic which the railroad is in a position to handle, and it must be sufficiently high to produce the largest income without reducing that bulk of traffic after it has once been encouraged to follow certain channels of trade. Reduced to its last analysis, the principle of rate making on railroads, whether stated positively or negatively, has been to charge all the traffic will bear. It no doubt has sometimes happened that certain traffic is carried by a railroad at a loss, the loss being justified either upon the ground that it is building up local industries upon the line of the railroad or that it is utilizing rolling stock and facilities which might not otherwise be employed, or that it is equalizing the bulk of traffic in each direction so as to give return loads to empties, or that it is necessary for a new railroad to encourage shipments out of its territory in order that it may have business to haul into that territory upon which it can charge profitable, or perhaps excessive, rates. It is apparent that these conditions do not enter into the express business, and it therefore follows that in no instance is the express business carried on at a loss, but in every case the rate is all the traffic will bear. Railroads make a general classification of freight, and in determining to what class a particular article belongs regard is had to its bulk and the convenience of handling; also, to some extent, to the quantity of traffic in that The prinparticular article, but more especially to its value. ciple supposed to govern is that a more valuable article requires greater care and involves greater liability on the railroad in case of loss. While this is to some extent true and is a proper factor in determining the rate, yet the old principle applies also, because a more valuable article will move at a higher rate than a cheaper article.

The railroads of the United States have not united upon a uniform classification. The Interstate Commerce Commission has endeavored to bring about such uniform classification without success. There is at present a classification applying to the territory east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio. There is also a classification applying to the territory west of the Mississippi, known as the western classification, and there may also be other territorial classifications. The two classifications named control the vast volume of railroad business. The railroads also have rates not included in the general classifications, known as commodity rates, which apply to certain classes of commodities which move in large bulk from certain territory, usually in one particular direction and frequently confined to a particular season of the year. It has been found by experience that these commodities would not move at all by experience that these commodities would not have at an unless these special rates were given them. Commodity rates usually exist upon grain, lumber, ore, building material, and a few other articles. It becomes apparent that the elements of commodity rates and classifications do not apply to the small package or express business. While some classification is necessary even in the express business, brought about by the difference in bulk and value of the various articles, yet the classification could be and is comparatively simple. Articles of extraordinary value could carry a special rate commensurate with the greater risk involved. It results from this brief analysis that there is no reason why the small package, or express business, can not be segregated from the general transportation business and successfully conducted by the Postal Department.

I want to say here that I have been very much inclined to favor the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Goeke] for the acquisition of express companies. It has been contended that the acquisition of the express companies would be a step in the direction of Government ownership of railroads. I have thought that problem out at the very start of this proposition and I do not believe that it will be. I do not believe that it is any more necessarily a step in that direction than any other form of a parcel post.

The real question to be determined from a business standpoint is whether the small package is different in kind or character from the general transportation business. If it is, if it is severable from the general transportation business, if it contains elements other than those contained in the general transportation business, then it may be carried without involving the general transportation business. It seems to me that the very existence of the express companies goes to show that the package business, from some reason or other, is severable from the general transportation business.

Let us see about that proposition. The foreign parcel posts, all except that of England, are practically unlimited as to weight. I think that on the Continent the limit reaches as high as 130 pounds permissible weight in the parcel post. In other words, there is no express business in the continental countries except the international business lately established by the American Express Co. So there is no fair comparison between conditions in America and on the Continent. On the Continent the parcel post has taken the place of the express companies, and when you commence to compare the continental parcel post with what we propose in this country, you are, in fact, comparing the express business in the hands of the Government with what we propose to establish.

The question is why the limit is fixed at 130 pounds. In my judgment, it makes no difference whether you fix any limit at all. There is a natural limit of weight beyond which it is not profitable to move packages at package rates. The railroads have found that out, and they fix the minimum weight at 100 pounds, and that is practically the maximum weight of the parcel business. That is shown unquestionably by this report of the hearings before the Post Office Committee, that 96 per cent of all the parcels moved by the express companies are under 100 pounds, and less than 5 per cent—4 and a fraction—are over 100 pounds.

Mr. LEWIS. And, if the gentleman will pardon me, the average weight of all the express shipments is 33 pounds.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; and the average weight of the express shipments is 33 pounds. So that the largest part of them must be under 33 pounds to counterbalance the few that are over that. Now, the package business involves considerations different from the heavy transportation business in these respects, that in the parcel business speed and convenience, the two elements of postal service, are the most necessary elements.

A man sends his parcel by express to get speed, convenience, and care commensurate with the value of the package. The third element, that of value, enters into the express business, and it ought to be a very material feature in fixing the rates.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. If I have the time; but I do not want to trespass upon the time of some other gentleman.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does the gentleman favor the purchase of the express companies?

Mr. BORLAND. I am inclined to think so. Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. About 50 in all?

Mr. BORLAND. There are nominally that many, but in reality there are not that many.

Mr. LEWIS. About 13.

Mr. BORLAND. I think there are only four in actual number, or five including the Southern.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Why not buy the small as well as the big?

Mr. BORLAND. There is no reason. I want to say in con-nection with this matter that I do not force my views upon any other gentleman nor have I committed myself to any plan; but I just want to see what the proposition is. All the evidence taken by this committee, as I say, was in the line of comparison of European systems with the American system, and gentlemen can find from the reports that the European system is practically a postal express or an express business in the hands of the Government, nothing more and nothing less; and that is the only kind of a system that has succeeded in moving any goods. The European systems not only have a zone rate, the minimum of which is very cheap, but they have a zone rate for longer hauls and they have a line of classifications not very complicated in its character. They have a maximum limit of weight which is higher than is necessary to the package business; so that the European system is practically an express system.

We are asked in this country to introduce the parcel post. For what purpose? Not to make business any safer, but to make the business cheaper. How on earth are we going to carry parcels in the post-office business to-day when we are paying railroads 4.6 cents per pound, or the price of first-class mail, for carrying these parcels, and the express companies are paying three-quarters of a cent a pound for carrying the same identical parcels with the same identical facilities? It is manifest if we continue our relations with the railroad companies with that rate on first-class mail we can not put in competition a system of parcel post. If the time ever arrives when our parcel post shall really become competitive with the express companies—a sure-enough parcel post—one that the express companies would begin to feel in the reduction of rates, then the inevitable economic principle would operate that we would either buy the express companies or we would drive them out of business. I take it that no man will dispute the economic proposition that private enterprise can not compete in the same country with the sovereign engaged in the same business. We can not say to the express company by the Interstate Commerce Commission that the United States will regulate your charges and your terms of carriage, and at the same time say that the United States in the Post Office Department will compete with your charges and compete with your terms of service. If such a thing were conceivable as a business proposition, and if we actually do compete with the express companies, we would have the whip hand of the express companies. We have the right through the Interstate Commerce Commission to say what they shall charge and we have the right in the Post Office to say what we shall charge, and if any man would do business in that way with that sort of competition in his business he is a mighty poor business man.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think the last statement of the gentleman is one of the most astounding I have ever heard upon the floor of this House—namely, that we would have the whip hand of the express companies in competition with those companies. Now, I ask the gentleman does not be know that in 1840 and the years immediately preceding that we had competition with the express companies in the carriage of first-class mail, and the express companies absolutely drove the Government out of the carriage of first-class mail?

And let me say that in 1841 there were more letters collected and delivered out of hotels in New York City than out of the post office in New York City, and the gentleman has absolutely no evidence, historical or otherwise, to show that this Government, in competition with the express companies in the carriage of first-class matter, would have the whip hand.
Mr. BORLAND. Well, I am not familiar with the history that the gentleman cites nor the conditions surrounding the express companies driving the Government out of business, but it does seem to me-

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BORLAND. It does seem to me if the United States Government possessed and honestly exercised the power to regulate the express companies and exercised the power to compete with them in carrying the same class of business, it would not be a difficult matter for either one of them to drive the other out of the business.

Mr. MURDOCK. Because we do not exercise our monopoly in the carriage of other than first-class mail matter we are put in this position-of prosecuting the individual continually for the violation of the law which we permit the corporation or an association like the express companies to violate with impunity. For instance, in the last week at Denver, Colo., I am told the United States district attorney began a prosecution against a postal clerk for carrying outside of the mail a 2 or 3 pound package. That clerk, if he be guilty, will go to prison. Right in front of the clerk in the same train in another car the express company was carrying innumerable packages of the same nature. Does the gentleman think that is fair?
Mr. BORLAND. Of course not.

Mr. MURDOCK. Can the gentleman point to an arrangement in the law that would cure a case of discrimination of that kind except by the use of governmental monopoly?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Kansas is on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and should take the matter up.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman think he can cure it in any other way?

Mr. BORLAND. I was not attempting to cure the evil the gentleman speaks of. I did not know of it. The gentleman being on the Post Office Committee ought to take that matter up. I do think it is an outrage for the express companies

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CONNELL). The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent—
The CHAIRMAN. The time is under the control of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon].

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] give me 10 minutes more?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes

Mr. BORLAND. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Murdock] very briefly, and I would like the attention of the gentleman while I do it, that in 1840 and 1841, as I understand it, we did not have any Interstate Commerce Commission and had not engaged in the affirmative duty of regulating the rates of interstate carriage. Now, that may be one reason. I only suggest that, but I do say that I think it is an unbusinesslike outrage for the express companies now to be engaged in the profitable business of carrying the second-class mail and periodicals on the short haul and the United States Government to be engaged in the unprofitable business of carrying the same periodicals on the long haul.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman see any remedy for that save by taking over the business of the carriers?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly. That is what I was going to-

Mr. MURDOCK. I say to the gentleman there is probably no remedy except that.

Mr. BORLAND. The merchandise business is distinct from the business of carrying intelligence. The first-class mail ought to be taken into every corner of this country without regard to its cost. I do not care how humble the man is or how humble his message is, it ought to be taken to every American citizen without regard to cost and at the national expense. [Applause.] But no such reasons occur in the matter of carrying merchandise. That is a business proposition, and no flat rate in respect to merchandise ought ever to be made that will enable the express companies to get the cream of the shorthaul. That is exactly the reason, according to the testimony of the Postmaster General, of the loss on the large bulk of second-class mail. I was perfectly astonished to read in the hearings of the Postal Committee that the Postmaster General claims it costs more than 12 cents a pound to carry fourth-class

The report of the hearings says:

Mr. Beach, the Post Office Department states to Congress it costs a fraction over 12 cents a pound to carry fourth-class matter. What have you to say to that?

What does anybody say to that when we propose to make a rate of 12 cents a pound on fourth-class matter? We can not compete with express companies on a parcel post. way to engage in the parcel business is by a classification of commodities, with a zone rate for carriage, and take over almost exclusively the carriage of small parcels. I have an idea, gentlemen, that the provisions in this bill should go no further than the creation of a postal commission with power to study this subject from a scientific standpoint and report a full and complete bill at the opening of Congress in December. I believe it would be a grave mistake to include in the present postal bill any hasty experiments which can not fail to involve the Government in a large amount of expense in providing equipment and preparing for their operation, which may be wholly unjustified.

I thank you. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Roddenbery having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following

H. R. 22642. An act providing for the protection of the interests of the United States in lands and waters comprising any part of the Potomac River, the Anacostia River or Eastern Branch, and Rock Creek and lands adjacent thereto.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. Kent] 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, this postal appropriation bill covers so many topics that it would be impossible for anybody to believe one way about all of them. I am going to take up a few subjects in which I agree with the committee report, and a few others in which I disagree with it. Concerning most of the technical provisions I am in ignorance and therefore express The first topic in which I am particularly inno opinion. terested is the one in section 6, for the removal of the That reform has been largely accomplished by the rescinding order of the President, but I have seen nothing in the rescinding order which applies to an important phase of the original order or to the way in which it has been translated by the Post Office Department, namely, the right to regulate the entrance of employees into societies or associations.

In the Committee on Civil Service Reform, of which I am a member, we had much testimony as to this part of the gag law. Gen. Stewart stated that the department did regulate the men's right to join associations. There was complaint made of those men who joined associations to which their superior officers were not eligible. This, it seems, would point out the necessity for postal employees maintaining organizations like Sunday schools, with their superior officers as class teachers and Postmaster General Hitchcock as superintendent.

I do not believe that it is proper for the Government to pretend to state what associations men shall or shall not join. It seems to me that is a question for the men to determine. The question is, What shall they do after they join associations?

believe the men have the right to join associations that affiliate with the American Federation of Labor, always provided, as was shown by the testimony taken before the committee, that the American Federation of Labor can not order these men to strike, coupled with the statement of the men that they had no idea of striking, but propose to seek their remedies through legislation, and their further admission that sympathetic strikes would be intolerable when undertaken by Government employees. Therefore I am much in favor of the provision at the end of section 6, upon which it is our duty to act, in spite of the rescinding order of the President.

Now, as to the parcel post, section 8 of the bill, I read with considerable interest the report of the committee. That report, on page 9, recites the arguments pro and con of those who favor and those who disapprove a parcel post. The statement reminds me of an incident that happened in my experience in Nebraska, where, in conjunction with others, we had fenced some pastures for our cattle. We found an old Missourian, the owner of several horses that he had put in our pasture. When we asked him why he had put the horses in the pasture, he said: "Some people say it is good for cattle to have horses in the field with 'em and some say it aint; for my part. I dunno."

The statement on page 9 seems just as far from a determination of the question as the statement of the Missourian as to why he put the horses in the pasture with the cattle. I believe we have had enough investigation to go into this matter of parcel post and determine something definite.

I am in favor of the Anderson bill, because it provides for a zone system. I believe the flat-rate system is untenable and unjust and intolerable when applied to merchandise. It repre sents a subsidy given to those who ship long distances, which must be paid by overcharge of those who ship short distances. There is no doubt but that in all questions of economics we shall find that sociology is closely interwoven. We can not get along without the rural settlement, without the country villages. We do not want to subsidize the incompetent merchant in the country village by excessive express or postal rates, nor do we wish to subsidize the merchant shipping long distances, who would deprive the country merchant of the legitimate factor of shipping cost and distance. I believe that the Goeke bill, to take over the express companies, is the proper, definite, final solution of the parcel-post system.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. KENT. Certainly. Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The gentleman spoke of the Anderson bill. Does the Anderson bill fix the weight limit and the cost of a parcel post? Mr. KENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. What is the rate limit and what would be the cost?

The weight limit is 11 pounds and the schedule Mr. KENT. of rates will all be found in the issue of the Congressional RECORD of April 22

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. There are so many of these bills that it is impossible to follow them all.

Mr. KENT. I think the Goeke bill is the ultimate thing. But I do not believe we could get results from the Goeke bill in any short time, and I do believe we could get the benefits of the Anderson bill immediately. I further believe that they would not conflict with each other, but that the parcel post as regards larger packages would naturally blend into a national parcel express.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KENT. Yes, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman tell how many employees would be taken over if we should adopt some such measure as the Goeke bill?

No; I have not gone into details.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can anyone advise us as to how many Government employees would be involved in taking over the express companies?

Mr. LEWIS. If the gentleman from California will permit me to answer in his time, the latest information on the subject is contained in the census bulletin of 1907. I am not speaking precisely now, but my recollection is that there were about 50,000 express company employees then.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Fifty thousand employees of the various express companies who would by this transformation process become employees of the United States?

Mr. LEWIS. That depends on whether all of them would be

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would involve the bonding of the employees, the tracing of losses, and all the other questions that now confront the express companies.

Mr. LEWIS. We have postal employees now in every town, village, and hamlet of the country, and where duplications would take place, of course eliminations would follow.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has given great study to this subject. Is it his opinion that in the taking over of the express companies, as proposed, the Government would necessarily have to take on about 50,000 more employees than it now has?

Mr. LEWIS. I did not say that. I think what I said was very distinctly said, that in 1907 there were about 50,000 employees; but to the extent that the representatives of the express companies in towns, villages, and cities duplicated the postal employees, eliminations would follow.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If 50,000 is too high a figure, can the gentleman make an estimate? I am sure this is a very important consideration, important in the matter of argument particularly. Can the gentleman estimate how many would be taken over, assuming that the number of 50,000 is too high? How many employees would be involved in this new system?

Mr. LEWIS. If I were to make an estimate, I should say that the acquisition and operation of the express companies by the Government would ultimately, when the traffic doubled by normal rates, mean an addition of 50,000 to the postal service. There are now over 260,000 postal employees.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman makes it 50,000.

Mr. LEWIS. That is what I should estimate, under the circumstances stated.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, the next matter of peculiar interest to me, not in the bill but in the discussion, is the bill suggested with the intent of granting Federal pay for improving country roads. That proposition, in the form it takes, is one with which I must disagree. The bill contemplates turning over sums of money to counties scattered throughout the country which can produce evidence that roads over which rural postal deliveries pass have been of a specified quality. There are a million miles of such roads now, and the immediate subsidy would amount to about $20,000,000. There would be necessituted an enormous expense for inspection on the part of the Government, and to my mind the expense would not lead to anything coherent or systematic in the way of road building. would be a case of easy money and therefore of wasted money. While I believe thoroughly and fully in Federal help for great national highways, I can not conceive of proper expenditure in such scattering through innumerable counties. The counties in my California district have supervisors, who have very little to do except look after roads. I do not think the Government would be satisfied with the uniformity of roads they build. If the Government went into the inspection business and saw to it that these roads were properly built, Congress could next take over the rest of the local governments, and we could have county day in this House, as many county days as there are counties, just as we now waste our time on District of Columbia day, when 5 commissioners with authority could govern Washington better than 400 Congressmen and 90 Senators. This bill is a piecemeal, patchwork sort of scheme, and much as I believe in the necessity of improving the highways of the country, I do not believe that the Federal Government should chop up its efforts into small, incoherent fragments, that must necessarily result in waste. Moreover, if a given road in a given county receives Government help on account of its being used for rural postal transportation, we can rest assured that there will be pulling and hauling from every direction to shift the rural routes to other roads or to get as many rural routes in each county as possible, just for the sake of the subsidy, whether or not such additional routes are justified. In the way this bill is drawn it is a tremendous temptation, and I am afraid that at least some few supervisors scattered here and there throughout the Nation might get into trouble. I once heard of a man who was an exile in Canada because, as he said, he had forgotten to build a church.

The question has arisen as to how taxes ought to be raised to construct roads. To my mind the Government might well help in the construction of great national highways where the work should be uniform in character and where there would be a chance for pride in the thoroughness with which the great arteries were built. The States may properly play their part, and in many cases are so doing by aiding with State highways. The little rural route is a local affair, a matter for the counties and the minor districts. The expense can and will be properly borne by these communities by whatever system of taxation they may choose. It is impossible to have a just system of pay for roads based on a frontage tax. There is no question about the iniquity of that as a final scheme. A frontage tax to support a great highway which passes a farm upon which the owner has trouble in subsisting is an obvious injustice. On the other hand, when we find cases where land for profit is subdivided for speculation owners certainly ought to pay all the primary cost of roads on a frontage basis. The question of taxation for road purposes, as well as for other purposes, will probably be best worked out under the Oregon system of giving counties the right to determine the nature of their own taxa-The Federal treasure never ought to be scattered in the heedless way this bill would scatter it. If the bill is a bona fide attempt to create national highways, it ought to provide for national highways; but if it is an attempt to scatter Federal money throughout the country for the popularization of re-electable Congressmen, that result could be much better attained by paying a subsidy on eggs, 30 cents a dozen for strictly fresh, 15 cents a dozen for fresh, and 10 cents for plain eggs.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey, time has the gentleman consumed? Mr. Chairman, how much

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CONNELL). The gentleman from California has consumed 16 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chair gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McGuire]. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, with millions of dollars now invested in post-office buildings and other equipment, an army of employees already in the postal service, and rural carriers delivering but a few pounds of mail daily, the United States Government ought to be able to handle the smallpackage business of the country better and cheaper than the ex-tion for going into the business and should leave it in private hands.

The strong demand from all over the country for the parcel post is based on the belief that we can do this, and on dissatisfaction with the present rates and service of the express companies.

But the proposition coming from the Democratic side of the House does not do what the country expects. It amounts to an unjust subsidy to certain large mail-order houses, to rank discrimination against merchants, farmers, and all others, whose shipments would be for not exceeding a few hundred miles, and to robbery-monopolistic robbery by the Government of its people.

One of the Democratic propositions advanced abolishes the express companies. The Government, having the power, takes a monopoly. If the Government does this, it owes it to the people to give them at least as good as they have now. The proposition advanced does not give as good as we take away when we abolish the express companies.

As distance is not considered, the parcel-post rate proposed by the Democratic side of the House being the same for 10 miles and 3,000 miles, 12 cents a pound, that rate was undoubtedly fixed by striking an average. All shipments for a greater distance than the average will be hauled at less than cost, the big eastern mail-order houses being the greatest prospective bene-ficiary of the subsidy. All shipments for less than the average distance will pay more than cost, the profits on the shorthaul business going to pay the subsidy on the long-haul busi-As Oklahoma is near the center of the country, we will ness. pay more than cost on the great majority of the packages we send.

If the parcel post proposed by the Democratic side of the House were enacted without the companion provision abolishing the express companies it would mean an enormous deficit, Without lowering a single rate the express companies would get the great bulk of the business of the country, pay their usual dividends, and leave the Government only the long-haul business at a loss

But what do you do when you abolish the express companies to avoid this deficit? The Government takes a monopoly, the most complete in the country, and then proceeds to rob. by extortionate rates, its people on the short and average haul shipments.

The other day I made a few inquiries at the Interstate Commerce Commission about express rates. I found that a 7-pound package is now hauled by express from Guthrie, Okla., to Newkirk, Okla., about 75 miles, for 40 cents. One of the provisions in this bill would put the "robber" express company that is making this 40-cent charge out of business, and then under your other proposition you would proceed to rob a man who sent a 7-pound package 75 miles by forcing him to pay the Government 84 cents, or 4 cents more than twice as much as he now pays the "robber" express company from which we are trying to relieve him.

I found that if a man at Guthrie, Okla., sends a man at Newkirk, Okla., an 11-pound package he pays the express company 45 cents, while under the parcel post proposed he would be required to pay the Government $1.32, about three times as After fixing this exorbitant rate you seek to abolish much. the express companies to make it certain toll will no longer be paid the express companies. If you do not put the express companies out of business, it must be admitted that some man who wanted to send an 11-pound package 75 miles might fail to see the benefits of this Democratic proposition and prefer to do business with a "robber" express company to doing it with a "robber" Government that charges three times as much as he pays the express company now. If you put your parcel-post provision through, the only way you can make the people use it on the bulk of their business will be by forcing them to by leaving them no other alternative.

The express rates on shorter distances than those I have mentioned would be less, though the Democratic parcel-post rate remains always the same regardless of distance.

I was informed that the express rate on a 7-pound package from Kansas City, Mo., to Guthrie, Okla., nearly 400 miles, would be 60 cents as against 84 cents that would be charged under the proposed parcel post, and on an 11-pound package express 75 cents, parcel post $1.32.

These comparisons are enough to show what the two propositions now up will do. We abolish the express companies and then force the people who are complaining of express rates to pay the Government on shipments up to several hundred miles much more than they now pay the express companies. We are able to do this because the Government is able to force a press companies do. If we can not do this, we have no justifica- monopoly. Yet if the Government takes this monopoly and then makes the outrageous charge proposed the Government should never proceed against any other trust or monopoly, for none could beat such extortion or favoritism as the Democratic side of the House proposes.

If the parcel-post provision proposed is not amended, I shall vote against abolishing the express companies, for I prefer to see the Government suffer a deficit rather than to see it force a monopoly and then rob its people by charging them far more than they pay the corporations we seek to abolish. The Government should give the people something better and at least as cheap as the express companies give. When this is done, but not until then, I will be glad to vote to abolish the express companies and to take for the Government a monopoly in the small-package business the same as it enjoys in the letter-carrying business

By looking at the map the gentlemen who framed this provision will find that the United States is somewhat larger than England or Belgium. They will find that it is farther from Los Angeles, Cal., to Portland, Me., or even to New York, than it is from London to Liverpool by a few thousand miles. It might be possible that a parcel post with only one fixed rate would be fair in a country the size of England, but it would not be in the United States, where each of several of the States are greater in area than all of Great Britain. With over 3,000 miles separating New York from San Francisco, it is clear that distance must be considered in fixing a parcel-post rate in this country. Otherwise a rate that will remunerate the Government will necessarily be so high that it amounts to extortion on the shorter distances. If it is low enough not to be extortionate on the short distances. In the short shipments, it will not pay its way and will mean an enormous deficit. No satisfactory and fair proposition can be devised that does not take distance into consideration.

If distance is considered, the local merchant and small city and town will not suffer. If they are given a fair deal they will not be hurt. If the Government will provide a parcel post they can use for their business, instead of being damaged, as they fear, they will probably benefit with the rest of the country. If, on the other hand, the present provision is enacted giving the cheaper rate on long shipments but providing a prohibitive rate for short distances, higher by several times in some instances than the present express rates, they undoubtedly will be damaged.

The people who want a parcel post will be gold-bricked if the present proposition becomes a law. In but few instances will they receive lower rates than they now have, while in most instances they will be robbed. Besides being drawn on the wrong principle, the measure is carelessly framed. A man on a rural route out of Washington mailing an 11-pound package to a man in the House Office Building would have to pay the regular rate, 12 cents a pound, instead of the cheaper rates authorized for rural routes. A man mailing a package weighing 17 ounces would have to pay for 2 pounds, 24 cents, instead of 17 cents, as he would pay under the present rate of a cent an ounce, the unit in the new rate being the pound.

I hope the parcel-post proposition reported by the committee will be amended by the House so as to provide a sliding scale of rates based on distance, rates as cheap, at least, as those the express companies now give. We should provide a parcel post that may be used for a 50-mile shipment as well as a 2,000-mile

I hope the rural-route provision may be amended so the cheap rate, ranging from 5 cnts for a pound to 25 cents for 11 pounds, may at least apply anywhere in the territory of a post office, from one route to another from the same office, and from any point on a route to any address in the city from which the route originates.

I hope it may be amended so as to retain rates as cheap in every case as are now granted under the ounce unit.

From all over the country are coming protests from business men and others who will be injured if a parcel post is passed that does not consider distance in fixing rates. Why not consider distance and treat these interests fairly?

From all over the country are coming demands for a parcel post. I feel such a measure is inevitable. What is proposed is Why not give a sliding scale of rates based on disa fraud. tance, so that those who demand a parcel post may have what they want—a parcel post that they may use without being robbed, whether sending a package 10 miles or 3,000 miles?

Mr. Chairman, there is another feature of this bill to which I desire to address myself briefly, and that is the question of the proposed increase of salaries for mail carriers on rural routes. I came to Congress about the time of the establishment of rural routes, and I have observed with much interest its development and its benefits to the American people. From the reading of the speeches made at the time of its inauguration, as well as for some time thereafter, it will be seen that it was regarded as purely experimental, but this service of the Government has passed the experimental stage and is one of the most important branches to-day.

It has been the policy of the representatives of the Government, both in the executive and legislative branches, for a great number of years to make rural life as convenient and satisfactory as city life, and nothing has contributed more to the convenience of the farmer and the man who lives beyond the limits of the city than the establishment of rural routes and the delivery of his mail at his door, and the right kind of a parcel post will be another great advance in this movement.

As long as the rural delivery service was in its experimental stage the question of expenditures by the Government for this service was strictly guarded, and the salary of rural delivery carriers was fixed at the minimum. Now that it is an established and permanent branch of the service, salaries should be fixed where we expect them to remain, so that Congress may not be required to give them further attention.

I have always said that the class of men engaged in the carrying of the mail in the rural districts were entitled to $100 per month for their services. There may be exceptions, but they are very few; and inasmuch as it is necessary to establish a uniform salary and their work being altogether of the same class and their burdens being so equally distributed, the salary should be a fair remuneration for the services rendered the Government. This bill does not go as far as I should like to see it go, but the provision for the increase of rural mail carriers in this bill ought to have the sanction of every Member of

You will readily see the necessity for the increase in case some general provision for parcel-post passes, and I certainly hope there will be such a provision-one that is fair alike to the country merchant and the farmer. Such a change in the law will add to the work of all rural carriers. hours of time each day to their work. Many of them in my district are now using, in the interest of economy, motor cycles, as they have found these machines to be cheaper than a horse and vehicle and cheaper than an automobile, but this means of travel will have to be abandoned as soon as the parcel post is adopted and they will be compelled to return to the horse and vehicle, or to automobiles, and in any event their expenses will be much more than they are now while they are using the motor cycles. With the increase of their work and the admotor cycles. With the increase of their work and the auditional time, it will be necessary for them to put in an additional time, it will be necessary for them to put in an additional time. tional expenditure for equipment, all of which are abundant reasons for the increase of their salaries.

I have voted for every increase that there has been since the rural route was established and shall continue to vote for every increase until the rural mail carriers are receiving $100 per month for their services, and I sincerely hope this measure will be retained in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I desire also to speak briefly on the provision of this bill intended to encourage good road improvement. Any thing that tends to the improvements of the country roads goes to the betterment of rural life, to the increase of farm values, and to a larger return to the farmer by decreasing his transportation costs. The provision of this bill under which the Government pays from $15 to $25 per mile annually as rental to the communities that have already been able to establish good roads means but little at this time to Oklahoma. Under it we give the most to the communities that have the best roads, and to the communities that have not been able to establish permanent good roads we give nothing.

I would prefer to see a law enacted creating a fund of several million dollars to be used in cooperation with the States, counties, and townships in constructing and maintaining good permanent roads, the Federal Government to pay at least a third of the initial cost.

However, the fact that the Government will assist, by paying annual rentals, the communities that do establish permanent Many communities, roads will encourage road improvement. especially the newer ones, are not in a position to undertake the work of permanent road improvement, and I feel that it would be wiser and more beneficial for the Government to assist those communities, but I shall vote for this provision for the encouragement that it does give road building. It is a step in the right direction, though I regard it as much too short a step for this great Government to take in this important work.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to fill up the gap, I would like to have unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, no bill presented to this House within my recollection develops so many radical departures from the ordinary legislative procedure as does this one produced by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. It is daringly radical upon many of the great problems that are matters of dispute before the people to-day. Our friends on the other side of the House, preaching the doctrine of economy, proposing to institute reforms, starting the extraordinary session of this general session of Congress with a pretense of reducing the expenditures of the Government by lopping off heads and cutting salaries, has changed front in almost every particular since the opening day of the session, but nowhere to a more marked degree than in this bill.

We had an attempted reduction of the tariff revenues first in the presentation of the reciprocity bill, which proposed to cut down the revenue of the Government no less than $5,000,000. Then we had the farmers' free-list bill, which proposed to reduce the revenue to the extent of $10,000,000 more. Then we had other bills—the wool schedule, which was to lop off $1,300,000, and a cotton bill, which proposed to lop off $3,000,000 more. Since that we have had very many sallies into the realms of economy, as, for instance, in the passage of the sugar schedule, which proposes to cut out substantially $60,000,000 of our revenue. All this is done in the name of economy, with no substitute save an attempted tax upon the incomes of the people. All this is done in the name of the common people, who are supposed to be sorely oppressed, and yet there has been no substantial change of law in spite of all professions.

Now, we have disputed for a long time in the United States with regard to the parcel post and the expensiveness of introducing such a system and of its probable effectiveness in a country like ours, with its long hauls and great areas. We have disputed as to the rates of railroad companies, telegraph companies, telephone companies, and express companies, and we have wondered whether we have properly regulated the conditions that have held in regard to these companies. We have discussed good roads and good waterways, and questions fairly debatable have arisen and been debated as to whether we were proceeding in the right line and with due regard to economy and the rights of the plain people. Those are problems that require discussion in Congress and should not be hastily con-But rather than bring them in separately, so that we could fairly discuss them, they have been thrust upon us in an appropriation bill under a rule which makes it necessary to deal with them as mere incidents of the rights and privileges of postal clerks and rural-delivery carriers. We have not had presented to this House in such shape as would enable us to properly treat it the question of the parcel express, involving the taking over of a vast force of employees and a wide extension of the postal system, with all of its responsibilities and profits or losses, nor have we had an opportunity to ascertain the sentiment of all the people of the country upon it. Neither have we taken up any measure pertaining to the improvement of good •roads, although great protestations affecting the farmer and the users of good roads have been made since this Congress began looking to the relief of those who felt that good roads were needed throughout the United States. We have not had presented to this House in such form that we may calmly and deliberately consider it the question of Government ownership.

But we have had brought in here all of a sudden all of these things in an appropriation bill, and they have been placed there as riders to that bill, which every Member of this Congress feels must pass in some form, since he is interested in the progress of the postal system and must safeguard the interests of his individual constituents therein. Those of us who come from the districts that are closely populated are interested in the clerical force in the post offices and in the letter carriers, who perform most excellent public service, and in the many other features of the service as it pertains to us; and those of you from the rural districts, who are in the majority in this House, are necessarily interested in protecting and advancing the interests and welfare of those rural carriers and those rural post offices that are a part of the districts which you represent. It is because you must stand by your rural freedelivery carriers, and because it is presumed we must stand by our city carriers and clerks, knowing that a measure must pass this House in order that the postal service may proceed, that you have brought in as riders to this measure, in the name and because of the postal clerks and the free rural-delivery carriers, the most radical and startling propositions in the matter of Government ownership that have been brought here since the foundation of the Government.

You propose to take over the express companies. Have you estimated the cost? Have you considered the consequences? On this floor a moment ago it was admitted that the number of employees to be taken over the moment you introduce your new system of Government ownership is 50,000 men. You propose to add these to the Government pay rolls and relieve the express companies of the responsibility of caring for them, and you also intend to deprive individual incentive, even corporate incentive, from going ahead and doing business upon its own account. You have something to consider in the matter of expense, those of you who are preaching economy upon the other side.

Take the matter of rural free delivery alone. are of staggering importance. A little over 15 years ago there was no free Rural Delivery Service in this country. We began in 1897 with 82 routes, costing $14,840. In 1911, a period of 15 years only, the number of routes had jumped to 41,656, for which $38,860,000 was appropriated. For the current fiscal year the appropriation is nearly $43,000,000, which means about 43,000 rural-delivery carriers. All the revenue we collect from the Rural Delivery Service is between seven and eight millions per annum, and the total loss for the current year is estimated by the department at $35,000,000. -that is to say, the The peoplecommon people, for whom you plead so loudly-have to bear this loss. And now, since you have got the free rural delivery started, no matter what the cost, you propose to start something else, and by this bill you intend to make the people pay for all the roads over which the rural carriers travel. The Post Office Department estimates the rural-delivery mileage at more than 1,000,000, which, at an average cost to the people of $20 per mile toll per year, would increase your delivery deficit $20,000,000 more, or a total of $55,000,000, for a possible return $8,000,000. Yet you are preaching economy.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You are preaching economy by introducing a proposition which proposes to saddle upon the taxpayers of this country the business of the express companies and their pay roll of 50,000 men, together with all their equipment, contracts, and damage claims, all of the risks, and labor conditions, and all those other conditions that are incident to Government control. Preaching economy! propose by this bill to make the Government of the United States, whose money we are sent here to justly and wisely appropriate, take this money out of the Treasury, the people's money, under the guise of an appropriation bill for the benefit of clerks and free rural delivery carriers, and to do what? Expend it on three classes of roads, to be supported by the Government of the United States, upon the pretense that somewhere, at some time, they are to be used by a wagon carrying the mail of the United States, or are to be footed by some one who has a mail sack upon his back. If you want to be fair in your proposition, why do you not make provision for another class of roads to be paid for by the Government of the United States, namely, the highways of the city, within the limits of the various congested centers, where the people have already paid for them, and where the heels of the carriers and the wheels of the wagons do as much damage as they do upon any country road in the United States?

Are you going to make provision for the sidewalks used by the letter carriers in carrying the mails of the United States, or are you going to continue by your policy of economy to provide only for one section of the United States and leave the others entirely out of consideration?

Oh, in this bill you propose another radical change in regard to the parcel post. You propose that those of us who live in the cities shall pay 12 cents a pound upon packages which we deliver through the mails, and that that rate shall be fixed and uniform with regard to us, but so far as the residents of the country upon rural routes are concerned, you provide a sliding scale of rates which means, in the last analysis, that if we move out of a city and live in the country we can have our packages carried in the mails on Government-built roads by rural carriers at 5 cents a pound. In other words, you are specializing as between the city and the country—we pay 12 cents and you pay 5—and you are violating the very essence of the Constitution of the United States.

We might as well be frank about these matters. Why do your States not go and build your own county roads? Why do you come to the Government of the United States and ask us to use the money of the people, the money of your people, the money of my people, to build the roads that you ought to build your selves? You ask, Do we build our roads? I answer, Yes; we do, because we are industrious, because we are saving, and because we want to thrive and prosper. The great Commonwealth of New York has appropriated millions and millions of money to provide roads which are used by every farmer who wants to use them, by every man who wants to carry the mails, by any man, whether he comes from California or whether he comes from New Mexico or whether he comes from Austria. Why do not you build roads in order that the rest of the country may have the same advantage that those of us who build roads for ourselves accord to others? The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania has just made provision for the construction of roads to the extent of $50,000,000, and yet my good friend from Iowa comes into this House, along with others who are now preaching this good-roads doctrine, because it carries an appropriation and because it pleases the farmers and because it pleases the rural-delivery men, and says that he wants the Federal Treasury to build roads in Iowa. Some other gentleman wants the Treasury to build roads in his State. What are you doing for yourselves?

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion? Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if the Federal Government had expended half as much money in the mountains of Kentucky as has been expended in and about the city of Philadelphia we would not ask the Federal Government for a cent and would build as good roads as they have anywhere in Pennsylvania. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The answer to that is so perfectly along and reliable that I am gold to her the transfer.

feetly clear and palpable that I am glad to have the opportunity of placing it in the RECORD. There are so many more people in the State of Pennsylvania, thriving and industrious, than there are in the State of Kentucky that they not only build their own roads in Pennsylvania, but contribute more than Kentucky can possibly do to the general development of the country,
Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman knows that we lost by the Rural Delivery Service last year $28,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it was in excess of that-about $35,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. There was an excess of revenues of the Philadelphia postal service over the expenses; does the gentleman know how much?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not give that, but there was an excess

Mr. MADDEN. I wish the gentleman would put it in the RECORD

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will look it up and put it in. I want to be as fair with my farmer friends as I can. I was born upon a farm and am a farmer's boy. I love the farm and want to go back to it. [Applause.] But I want others to go back to the farm, and every time I get the chance to do so I urge the people living in the streets and alleys of my city to go upon the farm.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. FOWLER. The way for us to get them to go from the city to the farm is to make farm life more happy and more productive than it is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is now much happier and more productive than many phases of city life. In one of the committee reports, which I now have not time to refer to, it is said that if the Government, from the Federal Treasury, were to construct these country roads it would be no longer necessary for the farmer to go out and use them to get to the great department stores to buy his goods, because he could go to the telephone and have them sent to him. I say to the gentleman from Illinois if that is the condition of the farmer to-day it does not hold throughout the district in which I live, nor do all my people have the advantage of that telephone service. They go out and hoof it to the stores to get what they want, and they pay fairly well for farm produce.

Mr. FOWLER. Will not good roads increase the desire to live in the country?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course it will. I am as much an advocate of good roads as is the gentleman or as is any man upon that side of the House, but I want the people to get a little busy in their own neighborhoods and their own counties and build some roads for themselves, rather than come constantly to the Federal Treasury and relieve the States of their responsibility.

Mr. FOWLER. Is not the building of good roads too big a proposition for any community to undertake?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think not. as much in favor of good roads as is the gentleman. Every approving adjective at his command applied to good roads I will indorse, but still it does not remove my objection to the Federal Treasury being drained for the purpose of building highway, but because they wanted to use that patriotic senti-roads in every county and through every little township, because, perchance, some time it may happen a rural carrier brings a spool of silk to Mrs. Maloney. [Applause.]

The time of the gentleman from Penn-The CHAIRMAN. sylvania has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL].

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, efforts have been made during nearly all the time I have been in this House by certain gentlemen and certain sections of this country to commit the Federal Government to the construction of ordinary roads throughout the country. And those agitations and efforts to commit the Federal Government to the policy of construction of ordinary country highways have come largely from the Southern and Western States of the Union. Because those States are large in territory and sparse in population and taxing power, they would like to have the Federal Government build their

I will not assume to discuss the constitutional aspects of I do not think it is constitutional, but I certhis question. tainly believe that if it is within the limits of the constitutonal power for the Federal Government to go into the State of New York and build common, ordinary highways, then it is within the same power to go into the city of Syracuse, where I live, and build asphalt pavements and concrete sidewalks.

I analyzed a batch of bills introduced in this House for the construction of roads several years ago. I found there were then 18 of them, nearly all by Democrats, and the great majority by southern Democrats, although there were some Republicans from Kentucky who had introduced bills. I do not know but that the late Mr. Brownlow, of Tennessee, was the father of these good-roads bills. These bills were of two or three classes. Some provided that the surplus in the Treasury every year be divided up among the States pro rata for the construction of roads, the money to be spent by the executive officers in the States. Those bills were introduced by State righters and antipaternalistic statesmen of the House. But none of them were fair, because they all provided that in the distribution of this fund among the States the cities would not be counted in the population in order to determine the proportion of money to be given to the several States.

Some of them provided that cities above 50,000 should be excluded from the count, and some provided that all cities of 30,000, and some that cities as low as 10,000 should be excluded. Everybody who introduced a bill figured up the cities in his own State and estimated the proportion that his State would receive by the exclusion from the count of cities above a fixed population in order to give his State the greatest possible advantage. I opposed those bills then and I have opposed them in every form in which they have come up since, because a law providing for the distribution of money according to the population and excluding cities would exclude 80 per cent of the population of New York State, and that State would get only one-fifth of what it would be entitled to according to its population, because New York is a State of cities, although it is a splendid agricultural State as well. Those bills were introduced by State rights Democrats, who did not want, in theory, at all events, the United States Government to send its agents into the States and build the roads. They wanted the money delivered to the officers of the State and the roads built by them. There was another class of gentlemen who introduced bills providing that the Federal Government send its agents into the several States and construct the roads and maintain them.

Mr. HILL. Is there anything in this bill that requires a single cent of this money to be expended on highways by the It is simply paid over to them to do what they please

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. This is true of most of these bills. This bill is simply a starter. It is intended as an entering wedge to get the Federal Government committed to the building of ordinary highways in the States. These men-

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it a start forward or backward? Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. You have done one thing after another. You have tried to get larger appropriations in the Agriculture appropriation bills.

Mr. LANGLEY. I hope it is only a starter. [Laughter.]
Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I know that is what you are fter. [Laughter.] But I will discuss that later.

A year ago, when it was proposed that Congress recess over Lincoln's anniversary day, a rider was put on that resolution or bill, to the effect that the Government should build a grand boulevard from Washington to Gettysburg, with monuments on either end. Why? Not because the people behind it were patriotic, not because they were interested in that particular ment for a holiday to commit the Federal Government to the building of ordinary country roads. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I do.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that if it had not been for the love of the free rural delivery carrier our friends on the other side would never have brought in any such measure as this now pending before us?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Why, they do not eare anything more for the rural delivery carrier than we do. They are resorting to one subterfuge after another to extract money from the Federal Treasury for their roads. [Laughter.] But why are they not honest and candid? Why do they say it is worth $25 for a horse and wagon and a lone letter carrier to go over a mile of road? Is not the statement of their claim proof of their insincerity?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The question I desire to ask the gentleman is this: It being the duty of the Federal Government to carry the mails and provide the facilities for doing it, is it not cheaper for the Federal Government to rent that road at $25 a year than build it?

Mr. MICHAEL, E. DRISCOLL. The Government is under no obligation to build roads or rent them. It pays $1,000 a year to the man who carries the mail, and under your scheme it would have to pay $25 a mile toll for the use of the road. You would have the Government not only deliver the mail, but also keep the roads in repair for the whole neighborhood. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Who furnishes the post-office building in your town? Does the Government say, "If you will furnish the building in which the post office is to be kept, we will furnish the post office?" No. The Government furnishes both the building and the facilities. Why not give us our facilities? Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Who furnishes the letter carriers in the country? Does not the gentleman think the Government has done very well for the farmer for the last 15 years? It has extended the rural service until it now covers nearly all the country. The letter carriers at the outset were paid $500 a year, but that salary has been increased from year to year until it is a thousand dollars a year now, and still it is proposed to increase it in this bill $74 a year more. I find no fault with this, because I like to see every man who is willing to work receive a fair wage. Do not you think it is doing pre'ty well for the farmers without building their roads? I think so, and I was raised on a farm.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman should remember that rural-delivery service is not for the benefit of the farmer any more than for the benefit of the department stores and the merchants and everybody else who is using the rural routes just as much as the farmer, and more.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I will not yield further. Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman answer me if that is true!

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. That is not a question, but a statement, which has no application.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from New York tell us whether he has ever heard of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Shackleford] refusing a post-office building in his district?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. New York does not ask the Federal Government to do for it things which it should do for

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Who builds its post offices, and who establishes its pneumatic tubes, and who furnishes the city

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I want to use a few minutes of my time myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Who asked the Government to improve his own post-office building? Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The Government maintains its post offices in city and country, and we do not ask it to pay rent for the use of our streets or sidewalks, while you demand $25 a mile for a horse and wagon going over your road.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it worth anything to the farmers of my district to establish a monumental building for Government purposes in a city?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Does not the gentleman know that this is merely a subterfuge? You are not asking for this on its merits. You are simply trying to get the Government committed to this bill, and next year you will demand larger rents or heavier tolls, and also that the Government build your roads

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman answer-Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I object to further interruption. [Laughter.]

I shall attempt to analyze in the few minutes that I have at my command the bills introduced in this Congress by Members of the House, and I think there are 39 such bills and resolutions providing for the construction of roads by the Government. Twenty-nine have been introduced by the Democrats and 10 by Republicans, but not one from an Eastern State, not one from Middle State, very few from the Mississippi Valley; but all from the great broad States in the South and West of large areas, long roads, small populations, and small taxing power.

The farmers in those States have been unusually prosperous during the last 10 or 12 years, and their prosperity has been increasing from year to year. The mortgages and other encumbrances which were on their farms a few years ago have been lifted. Many of them have deposits in the savings banks and many others are able to afford automobiles. I saw a statement a short time ago that there were 76,000 automobiles owned by farmers west of the Mississippl River. Those ma-chines are luxuries; and usually automobiles are considered liabilities rather than assets. Old Dobbin and a cheap wagon would do the necessary business quite as well, whereas those are used for comfort and pleasure, because the farmers are so prosperous that they can enjoy the luxuries of life. But they are not satisfied. They are jealous of the manufacturers and business people of the East, who they think have been getting more than their share of the country's wealth. This jealousy, envy, and antagonism have been manifestly developing during several years last past, and while they are yet in a nebulous condition they are constantly developing and organizing for a general assault on what they consider the concentrated wealth of the East, and just now it is in the form of a wave of national socialism sweeping up from the great West and Southwest. It is very largely the same spirit and motive which are back of this proposition to buy up all the express companies of the They want to commit the Federal Government not only to the building of country roads but to the policy of buying up all the old junk of the many express companies in the country—the old wagons, horses, trucks, and old stuff of every kind—which will be of no use to the Post Office Department when once acquired.

The Federal Government did not authorize or encourage the organization of those many express companies, and the Federal Government is under no obligation to them in any possible way. It can develop its parcel post or postal express if it seems wise to do so, and if that act on the part of the Government tends to reduce the profits of the express companies or drive some of them out of business they have no cause for complaint against the Government or against the people, whose agent the Government is, for they have taken advantage of their opportunities and have made all the profits their business would stand without regard to the complaints of the people who were obliged to patronize them.

What next? Why, if the Government goes into the business of postal express it will needs the use of many cars in order to handle the express business. The railroad companies are now charging the Post Office Department very much higher rates for transporting its mail matter than they are charging the express companies for transporting their express matter; and If the department can not make what the people or Congress consider satisfactory rates with the rallroad companies, in the future the people will demand that the Government buy its own cars and fit them up for express business, which will be more commodious, and it will be claimed that they will be cheaper. Then, if the Government buys one car, why not two? Why not 10? Why not the whole train? The express business will be very large if carried out according to the conceptions of the gentlemen who are agitating this measure. Then, if the Government owns the cars, why not the railroads and all the en-gines and machinery owned in the operation of the railroads? One follows the other in the most logical and natural way. This means the nationalization of all railways and also all the ships and steamboats in the country, and it means national socialism.

Mr. BERGER. That would be a good thing.
Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. You people from the South and West, who have been agitating for the construction of country roads by the Federal Government, are bent on getting money into the Treasury with one hand and drawing it out with the other to build your roads and do many other things in the way of domestic improvements which the States or municipal divisions thereof should do for themselves. The State of New York pays of the corporation tax 302 times as much as does the State of North Dakota.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. She got it from Dakota, though.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And yet North Dakota would get more than New York out of this road-building proposition, because it needs them more and because it has two Senators with as much power in Congress as New York's two Senators.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would we not also continue to pay 25 cents a pound for sirloin steak and 40 cents a dozen for eggs, which come from the farm, just the same as we are doing now?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. You Philadelphia people, who can afford to do it, would.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore], I will say that I think we

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not the cost of living be just as high to the city dweller, who must have three meals a day?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Certainly; and perhaps gher. The people in the country have got the idea into their heads that with a parcel post or postal express the express wagon will come up to the farmhouse door every morning and take the butter, eggs, apples, berries, grapes, chickens, hens, and turkeys, and that they can put a 2-cent postage stamp on the box and that the express agent will haul them away. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Why should they put on a stamp? Why is it not the duty of the Government to carry them all free?

[Laughter.]

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. That may be the next step in this comprehensive scheme of paternalism. They think that for that stamp they will send these things to the consumer in New York or Chicago or St. Louis or San Francisco. they expect to buy everything they want, from a piano to a paper of pins, from the catalogue department houses, and that all those things will come back and be delivered in nice packages and set out on their front porch, all for a 2-cent stamp. are going to eliminate the small merchant, not only in the village but in the city. They are going to save all the expense, and the farmer is going to get all that the consumer pays, less the 2-cent stamp. That is the idea some people have now, and that is what has been drummed into some farmers' heads by the champions of this measure, who are putting before us this first step in national socialism.

Can those dreamers expect to persuade any considerable part of either the city or country residents that this service can be done without being paid for by somebody; and if done by the Government, do they not know that it will cost very much more than if done by private concerns? Do they not know that all work done by the Government costs at least 50 per cent more than if done by private concerns or individuals? This service must be paid for out of one pocket or the other; either by the people who patronize the Government express or by the people at large in making up the deficit in the Post Office Department: and I am one of those who believe that a service of this kind. either in the form of parcel post or postal express, should be paid for by the people who patronize it; that in the transportabenefit it is done should pay the necessary expense of the service and not shift the burden on the body of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman as much time as he may need, up to 20 minutes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. To prove that this is the first step toward national socialism, I appeal to the Socialistic Party in Congress, which lives and moves and has its being under the hat of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Berger]. He says he is in favor of it. He says the nationalization of the railroads is a good thing.

Mr. BERGER. Yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The gentleman admits that it will follow the nationalization of the express companies.

Mr. BERGER. I do. Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. As a necessary, logical se-

Mr. BERGER. Yes. Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And the gentleman admits that the purchase of all the steamship companies will logically

Mr. BERGER. If the Government owned the steamship lines, ou would not have any disaster like that which befell the Titanic. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The gentleman admits that it would naturally follow the purchase of the railroads?

Mr. BERGER. Yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. That it would be a necessary consequence?

Mr. BERGER. Yes.
Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. So that the Nation would own all the express companies, railroad companies, steamboat companies, and all facilities used in the transportation of commodities?

Mr. BERGER. Yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Then, in order to be consistent, it would own all the telegraph companies?

Mr. BERGER. Yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. All the telephone companies? Mr. BERGER. Yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And everything used in communication, as well as transportation?

BERGER. Yes. That would mean progress. Travel would be safer than it is now.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And in order to be logical, then, the National Government ought to buy up all the coal

Mr. BERGER. That is perfectly logical.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And after the ownership of all the transportation facilities was in the National Government we should take in the gold and other mines. Is not that so?

Mr. BERGER. Yes. Gold mines, iron mines, and all other mines.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And all manufacturing plants?

Mr. BERGER. Not exactly.
Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is leading the witness. [Laughter.]

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The gentleman from Kentucky does not seem to like the prospect of what this postal-express bill leads to. It would mean the appropriation and nationalization of all properties employed in the manufacture and production of the necessaries of life. Is not that so?

Mr. BERGER. No, sir. That is where the gentleman from New York does not understand socialism. We do not want to take over-to nationalize-the industries until these industries are centralized by the process of economic evolution.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I am glad I do not understand it all.

Mr. BERGER. All right. But we want only the nationaliza-tion of such industries as are centralized.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. You would take in all of the steel business?

Mr. BERGER. Yes. The steel business is controlled by Yes. The steel business is controlled by a

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Very well. We have got as far as the gentleman from Wisconsin will now admit, but some of his friends, to my certain knowledge, go much further than he does. I think they are just as good Socialists as he is, but a little more progressive; that is all.

Mr. BERGER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I will yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. BERGER. Oh, no; I do not want to make speeches in the gentleman's time. I desire only to ask the gentleman a question. Does not the gentleman believe that I should know what Socialism stands for?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And does not the gentleman from Wisconsin think that I, as a Republican, should know what Republicanism stands for? And yet there are Republicans out in the wild and populistic West that do not stand for the same things I do. [Laughter.]
Mr. WARBURTON. I think the

I think the gentleman from New York is right. [Laughter.]

Mr. BERGER. Yes. But there are just now 57 varieties of Republicans but only one kind of Socialists.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I am afraid the gentleman from Wisconsin is not the true brand of Socialism. I have talked with them, read their books and their doctrines, and I know the logical carrying out of their doctrine means the nationalization of all things, even the necessaries of life.

Mr. MADDEN. And the ownership of all the farms.
Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Yes; it would include the land; you would socialize every farm in the country.

Mr. MADDEN. And make serfs of all the people. Mr. BERGER. Oh, no, no.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think they would also have some plan by which we could get potatoes and eggs on the Government plan?

Mr. MICHAEL, E. DRISCOLL. I think so. The time seems to be approaching, and is quite near at hand, when people will look to the Government—and especially the Federal Government—for support. The Socialist Party in Congress is logical and consistent, although, in my judgment, a little conservative for a Socialist whereas although the confidence of the confi servative for a Socialist, whereas other gentlemen who are advocating the construction of country roads, draining of swamps, and the management of the express business by the Federal Government are drifting into socialism under different names.

Practically every new doctrine proposed by the insurgents and progressives of the South and West, including all those proclaimed by the Peerless One and the Colonel, have been taken directly from the Socialist platform and have been served up to the people with but very little modification.

You gentlemen who call yourselves progressives and insurgents, and are proud of the appellations, flatter yourselves that you are original, and that because you are original you are statesmen, whereas you are plagiarists and reactionaries, for you are going backward to the doctrines and principles advocated by the German Socialists of 30 or 40 years ago.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Berger] has served a useful purpose here to-day by clearly pointing out to the people of the country who care to know that the postal-express bill which we are here considering, if enacted into law, will precipitate the country into national socialism. If that is what the country wants, and if that is what you gentlemen who are advocating this measure want, you are consistent in taking this first step.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word to those 39 gentlemen who prepared these 39 separate bills. Some of you who in theory are antipaternalists and States-righters would prefer to have the money sent to your States and there spent by your own officials. But you can not always have your own way in this regard, and when an appropriation is before you by which your districts or States may get some advantage it is then a condition and not a theory which confronts you. You are human, and yield to the demands of your people at home, who are constantly looking for help from the Federal Government, and you waive your academic views and grab for the appropriation. The fact is, your practical notion of State rights is to dip into the Federal Treasury as often and as deep as possible. [Laughter.]

You came together, you 39 gentlemen, and made up this com-osite bill. You have reduced 39 to 1. You think it looks mild posite bill. You have reduced 39 to 1. and harmless and that it will appeal to one State as much as to another, and thus commit the Congress to the policy of giving Federal aid to country roads. But let us not be deceived. When you get this bill into law on the statute books you will demand more. You will then demand that the Federal Government build your roads in some States, and send the money into other States for that purpose.

I have been watching the development of this Federal aid for ordinary highways movement for some years, and I think I understand the motives of the geutlemen who are back of it. There is a National Good Roads Association or organization, of which some years ago Mr. Batchelder, of New Hampshire, was president. He was also a granger and an officer in that organization. He went into the State of New York, as I was informed, and made some speeches and circulated some literature and persuaded some of the New York grangers to commit themselves to his policy. I made a speech here in Congress against it, and the Grange of Onondaga County sent for me to go home and explain my position. I did so, and discussed the matter before them in their county convention for two or three hours, and explained to them that it was to their advantage to stay in partnership with New York, Buffalo, and the other great cities of the Empire State for the construction of country roads in our State rather than to go into a pool with North Dakota, Montana, and other large States with long roads for the construction of country roads out of the Federal Treasury and at the common expense [laughter], and I think they saw it that way.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Yes.
Mr. GARNER. The gentleman's principal objection to this bill, as I gathered from the first of his speech, is that if we exclude certain cities from it New York would not get over 20 per cent, according to population. Now, his principal objection is that New York would not get her pro rata part?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. As a practical question, I am against it from start to finish.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman's objection is that New York would not get its part.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I contend that the building of ordinary country roads is a duty of the State, of the county, of the town; and in cities it is the duty of the city; and none of these municipalities should ask Federal aid to help them build their roads. They are now constantly demanding assistance from the Federal Government to do things that people did not dream of as national functions 30 or 40 years ago.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Yes, sir. Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman believe that the wealth of New York City is drawn from the entire Nation just as much as it is from the State of New York?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. It is drawn from all sources from which it will come. I have no doubt that New York does business with everybody it can.

Mr. KENDALL. And does anybody that it can.
Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has talked about North Dakota. I want to say that North Dakota has better roads to-day than New York has, in spite of all the money that they have spent in New York. Furthermore, the reports of the Agricultural Department show that the farmer gets less than 50 per cent of what the consumer pays. So if you want cheaper living you do not want to take it out of the farmer, but out of your transportation.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to hear that North Dakota has good roads, because that will mean that the gentleman from North Dakota will not join this gang of pirates who are trying to loot the Treasury [laughter] to build ordinary roads with. I am glad they have good roads up there, and I hope they will be better; and I wish there were good natural roads in other States, so that it would relieve the Treasury of the United States from the raid on it which is now threatened. What will these progressives be at next, when they get the National Government permanently engaged in road construction? Why, they have already organized a National Drainage Congress, whose mission is to engage the Federal Government in the business of draining swamps. I thought when they had national associations for the building of country roads and for the irrigation of arid lands in the Rocky Mountain regions that was about as far as they would want to go. But I was mistaken. They now want to drain their swamps. There are about half a million acres of swamps in New York

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And they also want to drain

the Treasury

Mr. MICHAEL, E. DRISCOLL. And there are about 19,000,000 acres of swamps in Florida. New York would pay about seventy-nine times as much money into the Treasury as Florida, and Florida would draw out thirty-eight times as much as New York to drain these swamps.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If that be true, does the gentleman not think it would be well for Florida and North Dakota to hitch up

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I do not expect the hitch up will be in just that way.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Would it not be wise for them to join in this crusade that the gentleman is talking about?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I think North Dakota ought to stand with me, because it has no swamps and has good roads. Laughter.]

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLI. Yes. Mr. HOBSON. I just want to ask the gentleman how he reconciles his philosophy with the clause-

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I have not been talking phisphy. I have been talking practical business. [Laughter.] How he reconciles that with the clause in the Constitution that our fathers put there authorizing the Federal Government to build and maintain post roads?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Oh, my father had nothing to do with that. [Laughter and applause.] But I love the Constitution and believe in it. I deplore the fact that some people seem disposed to tear it into shreds when an appropriation is concerned. If some of these gentlemen had their way-not for a very long time, but for a very short time—there would be no money left in the Treasury and there would not be a shred left of the Constitution. These gentlemen make speeches about State rights and antipaternalism, but when it comes to an actual appropriation they have but very little regard for that immortal document, while I believe in sustaining it and would be proud if I had any share in its adoption, by inheritance or otherwise

Mr. HOBSON. Does the gentleman believe that the large appropriations that are made for the improvement of New Harbor and other public improvements associated with that great city ought to be opposed by the States that are inland?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Does New York get as much, according to its business and population, as does Mobile, according to its business and population?

Mr. HOBSON. I would venture to say that the gentleman would find, if he will follow the record straight through, that New York has gotten the lion's share.

Mr. HILL. Oh, no.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. New York has the greatest and finest harbor in the whole country, and two-thirds of our tariff revenues are collected there. New York State a few years ago bonded itself for $50,000,000 for the construction of country roads, and the cities and towns have appropriated about the same amount to meet the State appropriation. Our State only a few years ago bonded itself for $101,000,000 to dig what is known as the barge canal, and before that canal is completed and all riparian and other damages fully settled and paid it may reach the sum of $150,000,000.

From the year 1817, when our State commenced the construction of the old Erie Canal, to the present time, it has spent nearly $400,000,000 for the construction, improvement, and maintenance of its canal system, very largely for the benefit of other parts of the country. New York's old Eric Canal was opened up for navigation in the year 1826, and at about the same time the fertile lands of the Mississippi Valley were opened up to cultivation, and the canal furnished for the products of the West a cheap means of transportation to New York and the other great consuming cities of the East.

When the barge canal is completed it will help New York City and Buffalo very much in a commercial way; also it will help the cities along the line some, but it will help the farmers, manufacturers, and producers of commodities throughout the western part of our country very much. It will be really a national waterway, and if it were in any other State except New York the people would demand that it be built at the expense of the National Treasury. It will keep the rates down not only on New York Central lines, which parallel it from Albany to Buffalo through the center of the State, but on all trunk lines from the West to the Atlantic seaboard. Yet our State is not asking the United States Government to build or assist in building this grand waterway, while my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] and others are organizing and maintaining an organization, known as the Deep Waterways Congress, for the construction, I think, of an inland waterway. They are very worthy gentlemen, clever and hospitable. They hold their congress or convention every year and invite us to attend, and give us dinners, wines, and cigars, and are very hospitable on those occasions, always with the same end in view, that they persuade the Congress to construct their waterways

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know-Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL (continuing). Whereas we are digging our own.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is in order that the treat traffic coming from the West may have a market in the East; that the farmers of the West may have the advantage of the markets of the East.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. New York State proposes to bond itself for an additional $50,000,000 to build roads. Why do you not do it? Go home and build your roads by a tax on your counties, towns, and cities, or by State aid, or in any way you please. The construction of roads is a local and internal work and should be taken care of by the State and municipal divisions thereof.

New York has purchased nearly 1,700,000 acres of forest reserves, and has already planted about 15,000,000 trees on those reserves, and it spends about $600,000 a year in the protection and reforestization of those reserves.

It spends about $250,000 through the health officer of the city of New York. Nearly all the immigrants who come to this country come through New York Harbor, and the examination of those immigrants for the purpose of the prevention of disease and the spread thereof is a direct benefit to the whole country as well as New York. Our State spends about a million dollars annually for defense, for the National Guard, Naval Militia, armories, arsenals, and so forth, for the direct benefit and protection of the whole country as well as New York. Our State is doing many things for itself which the other States never think of doing, but are constantly appealing to the Federal to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY].

Government to do for them; and this proposition to tax the Government $25 a mile a year for the use of a road for one horse and wagon is a part of the comprehensive and growing scheme to tap the Federal Treasury a little at this time in an apparently harmless way but much more by and by.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I just want to ask the gentleman one ques-Is not it true that if that $25 proposition goes in for the perfect road, and down to $15, that New York will get $100 for rent of her roads where Illinois and Alabama will get $1?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I have not any doubt, Mr. Chairman, that that is so, because New York, according to her area, has more good roads than perhaps any other State. we do not ask it for New York. New York does not ask any such help from Congress. There is not a man from New York who proposes such a high-handed and unreasonable measure [Laughter.]

Mr. HOBSON. I wanted to ask the gentleman if his conception of highways is not of intrastate highways only; whether in his philosophy he contemplates interstate highways?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I must again appeal to the gentleman not to lead me into the realm of "phylasaphy." Laughter and applause.] I have not studied philosophy since was in college.

Mr. HOBSON. I will state it in another way. gentleman believe as a Nation that each State ought to proceed individually, irrespective of its adjoining State, and build a pot pourri of roads throughout the country?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Each one should build its pot pourri in the way it thinks best. [Laughter.] State would build its own roads to the borders of the State, then all the roads would be built.

HOBSON. I will ask the gentleman in this form: Would he support a bill-and I have introduced one-under which the Federal Government would make a general survey of all the roads, so as to coordinate the States?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL, I have opposed that proposition time and again and expect to continue to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman takes his seat I want to ask him one question, responding to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon]: The money that is expended upon the roads in New York State is the money of the people of the State of New York?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Certainly it is.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The money that is proposed to be spent by this bill upon the roads of this country out of the Federal Treasury is also the money of the people of this country, is it not?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I do not know what you are leading to. I object to some of the ways they propose to get into the Treasury, and I object to them getting in for that purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will answer the question, I think. I want to know if it is not the people's money we propose to spend on these good roads?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Yes; in the way it is spoken of, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then if the people of New York spend their own money upon their own roads, and are then called upon again to spend their money upon these good roads in other States, will they not be taxed twice for good roads in this country?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Certainly. And that is what I told the people in my district, who called me home to explain these bills in regard to good roads. After New York will have bonded itself for many hundred millions of dollars for the construction of its highway system and will have established good roads throughout that Commonwealth, and every farm and home therein will be liable to tax for the payment of the interest and principal on those bonds, the other States, if they have their way, will have their roads built at the expense of the Federal Treasury, and the New York people will have to contribute a large preparation toward the tribute a large proportion toward the expense of constructing roads in other States in addition to liquidating the bonds and obligations for the construction of roads in their own State. That will be double taxation, against which I am trying to warn the people of our State, and what applies to New York applies to Pennsylvania and all the other large, populous Commonwealths in the country. [Applause.]
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York

[Mr. Michael E. Driscoll] has expired.
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, section 6 of the bill under consideration is, to my mind, a new charter of freedom for the post-office clerks and carriers of the country. pates them from the slavery of gag rule and petty despotism. I regret that Congress should find it necessary to enact a law giving to this vast body of employees the constitutional right of free speech and petition. But that they have been denied that right is conceded by all who have considered the subject, and I look upon it as a disgrace to realize and to know that because these men are confined within the four walls of post offices they should be told to shut up whenever they feel that they have a grievance or whenever they have a petition to present to Con-

It is a splendid tribute to the wisdom of the Democratic majority in this House, following along the lines of legislation already enacted, to take up the grievances of these men, not only for a proper eight-hour regulation of their work, but, more than that, for the constitutional right of free speech. I value principle more than I value a dollar. I believe that the principle of free speech and the principle of the right of petition is far I believe that the principle more valuable to any post-office clerk and to any letter carrier, or to any employee in the Government departments, than the mere question of compensation.

I marvel to realize that such a gag should have been put into the mouth of any man or any individual, and my astonishment becomes more alarming when I consider the source of this mean and contemptible order. I sent over to the White House the other day for the orders dealing upon the subject of gag rule. I do not believe it has been dwelt upon in this House with sufficient force, and I have not heard it adverted to, and therefore I shall read the Executive order which bears the date of January 31, 1902: EXECUTIVE ORDER.

All officers and employees of the United States of every description, serving in or under any of the executive departments, and whether so serving in or out of Washington, are hereby forbidden, either directly or indirectly, individually or through associations, to solicit an increase of pay or to influence or attempt to influence in their own interest any other legislation whatever, either before Congress or its committees, or in any way save through the heads of the departments in or under which they serve, on penalty of dismissal from the Government service.

WHITE HOUSE, January 31, 1902.

That order, in my judgment, would be a good order for a Czar to issue. That would be a good order for a man who loved despotism to issue. But what was my surprise to find that it was issued by a "friend of the people," that incarnation of altruism who is preaching the gospel of free speech, and incidentally seeking a third term at the hands of the American people-Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause on the Democratic side.] man who preaches free speech put the first gag in the mouth of every Government employee, and said to him when he came with a legitimate petition, a legitimate grievance to Congress: "You shall not speak; you have not got the right of an American citizen to present your grievance to Congress." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Four years went by, time enough in which to consider the order; time enough to consider what were its effects upon men who were grieving under its burdens, who were chafing under its restraints, who felt that they did not have the right of free men in a free country, who knew that they were denied the right to organize, and who were told that they should go to their department heads and give them their grievances and petitions. Why, a man might as well go to his executioner as go with a petition or grievance to one of those department heads. Clothed for the time with a little brief authority, exercising that despotic sway which only small, petty individuals can exercise, what chance would there be for a petition, what chance would there be for a grievance to be heard under those conditions? Department heads and superintendents are part of the machine which bosses the employees; their sympathies and beliefs are at variance with the men under them. They have no concern for the men's grievances, and it is farcical to say that the employee can secure justice by petitioning his The employee who is foolish enough to bring his tale of woe to his chief invites either a reduction in pay or dismissal from the service.

Four years went by, and the same gentleman who preaches the doctrine of free speech, but who placed the gag in the mouth of every Government employee, renewed the order, only to enlarge its provisions. I read the order of January 25, 1906, signed by the same man:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

The Executive order of January 31, 1902, is hereby amended by adding "or independent Government establishments," after the words "departments" in the third and ninth lines.

As amended the order will read as follows:
All officers and employees of the United States of every description, serving in or under any of the executive departments or independent Government establishments, and whether so serving in or out of Washington, are hereby forbidden, either directly or indirectly, individually or through associations, to solicit an increase of pay or to influence or attempt to influence in their own interest any other legislation whatever, either before Congress or its committees, or in any way save through the heads of the departments or independent Government establishments in or under which they serve, on penalty of dismissal from the Government service.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 25, 1906.

The language is similar to the language of the first order; so that there was no repentance upon his part, so that there was no heeding of the cry of distress raised by these men, struggling along, if you please, upon a wage schedule which was established in 1854, and, in addition to that scanty remuneration for their work and labor and service, they were burdened and shackled by this rule imposing silence in the face of exasperating conditions.

The present occupant of the White House, following in the footsteps of his predecessor, made an additional order on November 26, 1909. Here it is:

EXECUTIVE ORDER. (No. 1142.)

(No. 1142.)

It is hereby ordered that no bureau, office, or division chief, or subordinate in any department of the Government, and no officer of the Army or Navy or Marine Corps stationed in Washington, shall apply to either House of Congress, or to any committee of either House of Congress, or to any Member of Congress, for legislation or for appropriations or for congressional action of any kind, except with the consent and knowledge of the head of the department; nor shall any such person respond to any request for information from either House of Congress, or any committee of either House of Congress, or any Member of Congress, except through or as authorized by the head of his department. department. WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 26, 1909.

Let us say, in justice to the gentlemanly occupant of the White House to-day, that although he issued that order in 1909 he has seen fit recently to make a modification of it and of President Roosevelt's two orders, and for that modification I want to give him the credit which he justly deserves. [Applause.] I will read that last order:

EXECUTIVE ORDER. (No. 1514.)

(No. 1514.)

It is hereby ordered that petitions or other communications regarding public business addressed to the Congress or either House or any committee or Member thereof by officers or employees in the civil service of the United States shall be transmitted through the heads of their respective departments or offices, who shall forward them without delay with such comment as they may deem requisite in the public interest. Officers and employees are strictly prohibited either directly or indirectly from attempting to secure legislation, or to influence pending legislation, except in the manner above prescribed.

This order supersedes the Executive orders of January 31, 1902, January 25, 1906, and November 26, 1909, regarding the same general matter.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 8, 1912.

WM. H. TAFT.

I say that the President of the United States deserves credit for taking a step forward and hearkening to the provisions and principles of the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees the right of free speech to every citizen of this country. [Applause.] It seems strange, referring again to the first two orders, that a man who is making such a clamor for public recognition and who is seeking the approbation of the American electorate in the primary contests now waged throughout the country, should be speaking so vociferously about the right of the people to rule when he himself, in two Executive orders, forced down the throats of every Government employee in this un-American and unrighteous gag rule. this country

Recognizing the right of every citizen to free speech and to petition Congress, this Democratic House glories in the reiteration of the principle contained in the first article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and by this legislation we strike from the enslaved employees all fetters and restrictions, thus restoring them to an atmosphere of liberty and freedom and rescuing them from the suffocating confines of departmental despotism.

We are not content with the faint-hearted recognition by President Taft of the right of every citizen to petition Congress; he would emasculate that right by having petitions go through heads of departments. We score without reservation the highhanded Executive orders of President Roosevelt, and we pity the feeble attempt at correction by his successor. This bill will remove the dread and fear which to-day paralyzes the manhood of civil-service employees. We know that a man with fear in his heart can not enjoy his life. Instead of a living, breathing, red-blooded man, he becomes a mere pawn or automaton. This bill will give these men the right to organize, so that in their peaceful assemblies they can discuss their conditions and seek in the open daylight a remedy for every abuse.

The hearings before the committee that had this question under consideration revealed the fact that many men to whom was given the right to seek the betterment of their condition through legislation were only given a mock license, terminating generally in enforced resignations. Men seeking to better their condition by invoking the aid of their Congressmen soon found themselves in disfavor when they returned to their employment, and by some subterranean method their official extinction was quickly accomplished, and they soon found themselves out of a job.

As an old Government employee who knows the exacting hardships which these men have to endure and their constant toll and labor, because Uncle Sam's work never flags, I take particular pleasure in bearing testimony to their industry and their fidelity. I well recall my experience as a clerk in the New York post office. There is a portal there through which the employees enter that will not close until the judgment day. The massive door of that portal was pushed back many years ago, and is embedded in a groove grown rusty through misuse. Beyond that door and within the building an atmosphere choked with dust and dirt from mail bags has worked the physical destruction of many an employee. No doubt many post offices throughout the country are afflicted with the same insanitary conditions. Night and day the work goes on, and the men who to-day are gagged by Executive orders and denied the right to organize, labor and toil in the prescribed ruts of dull Government routine. For the work they do they are poorly compensated and slightly appreciated. They have worked hours without number in overtime without remuneration, and, of course, they suffer from the tyranny and despotism of the petty officials whose sense of importance exacts implicit obediance in the minutest datall to every order and make that to consecute the minutest datall to every order and make the form ence in the minutest detail to every order and rule. And to cap the climax they are branded, although American citizens, as inferiors to their fellows by Executive orders.

It is anomalous that throughout all the legislation enacted for the benefit of Government employees in the way of reduction of hours of labor the 32,319 clerks employed in the 2,351 first and second class post offices of the United States should never have been able to bring Congress to a recognition of their just dues.

Realizing that this Democratic majority, through the committee which has reported this bill, have seen fit to recognize the just demands of these honest, hard-working, and conscientious laborers in the field of Government employ, I want to congratulate that committee, and I want to congratulate the Democratic majority in this House, which I know is anxious to record itself in favor of the appeals of these 32,319 clerks to whom justice has been so long delayed. This bill will also restore to the letter carriers of the country the eight-hour law out of which they were juggled by a Republican House in 1900. [Applause.]
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, when this debate is finished and a motion is in order I shall move as an amendment to the pending appropriation bill to strike out all of section 9 now in the bill, and in lieu thereof insert my bill for a general parcel post, as follows, to wit:

post, as follows, to wit:

SEC. 9. That the common weight limit of the domestic postal service of the United States is hereby increased to 11 pounds, the common limit of the Universal Postal Union, and that in the general business of the post office the 1-cent-an-ounce rate on general merchandise—fourth-class mail matter—be, and is hereby, reduced to the third-class rate, 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof.

That the rate on local letters or sealed parcels posted for delivery within the free-delivery services is hereby determined at 2 cents on parcels up to 4 ounces, 1 cent on each additional 2 ounces; at non-delivery offices, 1 cent for each 2 ounces.

That all mail matter collected and delivered within the different rural routes of the United States is hereby determined to be in one class, with rates, door to door, between the different houses and places of business and the post office or post offices on each route, as follows: On parcels up to 1 twenty-fourth of a cubic foot, or 1 by 6 by 12 inches in dimensions and up to 1 pounds in weight, 5 cents; on larger parcels up to one-half a cubic foot, or 6 by 12 by 12 inches in dimensions and up to 11 pounds in weight, 5 cents; on larger parcels up to 1 cubic foot, 6 by 12 by 24 inches in dimensions and up to 11 pounds in weight, 5 cents; on larger parcels up to 1 cubic foot, 6 by 12 by 24 inches in dimensions and up to 50 pounds in weight, 10 cents. No parcel shall be over 6 feet in length, and in no case shall a carrier be obliged to transport a load of over 500 pounds. That the word "packet" wherever used in laws relating to the postal service means all matter of every class which is by law made mailable.

That on all unregistered prepaid mall matter without declared value an indemnity up to $10 shall be paid by the Post Office Department for such actual loss or damage as may occur through the fault of the postal service. And this without extra charge. Certificates of posting shall be provided on demand. On registered parcels of declared value, and o

Mr. Chairman, this proposed general parcel-post amendment to the pending Post Office appropriation bill is the identical bill I introduced on April 4, 1911. It has been pending in the committee ever since. It is the parcel-post bill people of this country want, and if it is adopted the United States will have a general parcel post. The neglect of the United States to establish a general parcel post has for years limited the easy exchange of commodities and merchandise between producers and manufacturers and the consumers, and it has placed our Government far behind the times in progressive legislation for the people.

It is a fact that to-day under the English-post-American-ex-press arrangement parcels can now be sent from any part of Great Britain to any part of the United States at the following rates: Three pounds for 30 cents, 7 pounds for 40 cents, and 11 pounds for 79 cents. And under the British contract with the American Express Co. these parcels are transported from one end of this country to the other, 3 pounds for 36 cents, 3 to 7 pounds for 48 cents, and 7 to 11 pounds for 60 cents. Meantime the express companies tax domestic merchandise of the same weight from 75 cents to $5.50, according to the distance traversed, while the post office taxes the public for a similar domestic service on a 3-pound parcel 48 cents, on a 7-pound parcel in two packages $1.12, and on an 11-pound parcel in three packages, $1.76.

What a spectacle is presented to-day to the Congress of the United States when we witness this unjust discrimination against our own people in favor of the foreigners. Who owns the post-office facilities in the United States, the people of Europe or the people of America? That is the question the voters are asking us and are going to ask every Member of Congress in the coming campaign. I know where I stand. My position can not be misunderstood. I stand for the people when the people are right, and they never were more right in all their lives than they are to-day when they appeal to their Representatives in Congress to give them what every other civilized government on earth has-a general parcel post.

The people demand and have demanded for several years a general parcel post. I know the people of the country favor its inauguration. I feel confident its establishment will be of inestimable benefit and advantage to the producers and to the consumers and to all concerned.

Just think of it. A person living in any part of Europe can send to any part of the United States by mail a parcel weighing two and one-half times more than the United States limit for about one-third less in cost than the present home rates. In other words, the world postal-union package unit is 11 pounds to the parcel, at the rate of 12 cents per pound, whereas the United States unit is only 4 pounds to the package and at a cost of 16 cents to the pound. The parcel rate in the United States prior to 1879 was 8 cents per pound for a package limited to a weight of 4 pounds. After that the rate was doubled, but the weight remained the same. Since 1879 the cost of transportation has greatly decreased. The question is, Why should not the people be given the benefit of this decrease by the establishment of a uniform low postal rate for parcels that will encourage the use of the post office as a medium of exchange of commodities and thus greatly facilitate trade?

Since the introduction of the rural free-delivery system in this country its operation has proved so satisfactory and so successful that Congress overlooks the annual deficit arising from the unreasonable restriction placed in the law limiting the kind of postal matter to be carried to letters, newspapers, and periodicals. The weight of this average load is ascertained to be but 25 pounds per trip, while the vehicle which the postal agent is required to supply can readily carry at least 500 pounds. It is estimated that should the restriction be removed and parcels be carried enough revenue would be received from the additional postage to more than pay the total cost of the system, and not only make it self-supporting, but largely decrease the annual postal deficit. Besides the establishment of a general parcel post would, to a very large extent, cheapen the cost to the consumers of the necessaries of life and go far to lighten the burdens of the average family.

Our failure to provide a general parcel post is causing to the post office a needless loss of $38,000,000 a year, and to the public loss of hundreds of millions, while at the same time we deprive the carriers of an opportunity to earn a reasonable living; and the time is now at hand for Congress to heed the insistent demand of the people for an extended parcels post along the lines of my bill, the express companies to the contrary notwithstanding.

The people are going to win this fight. The citizens of the United States are certainly entitled to utilize the advantages of their own post-office system the same as the people in Europe now do; and they would gladly do so if the Congress would only enact a law, and to this end I appeal to the patriotic Members of Congress to lend a helping hand in this struggle for genuine postal reform.

The post office is one of the oldest governmental institutions, an agency established by the earliest civilizations to enable the people to inform themselves as to the plans and movements of their friends and foes, and from the dawn of history the only limit the people have placed upon this service has been the capacity of the existing transport machinery.

The cursus publicus of imperial Rome—the post office of the Roman Cæsars—covered the entire business of transportation and transmission, and with its splendid post roads, swift post horses, and ox post wagons the Roman post office was a mechanism far wider in its scope than that of our modern post office; and, except for the use of mechanical power, the old Roman post was far more efficient in its service to the people than our modern post office in its service to American citizens.

The evil of the Roman post office, and the royal postal service that succeeded it, was its restriction to the enrichment of the ruling powers. They were the prototypes of our modern express companies, which have for their chief end the enrichment of their stockholders rather than the promotion of the public welfare.

As far back as 1837 Rowland Hill, of England, promulgated to the world the law that once a postal-transport service is in operation the cost of its use is regardless of the distance traversed upon the moving machinery by any unit of traffic within its capacity, and upon this law he established the English pennyletter post of 1839.

In this country the people own the post office and want to use it as their postal express company. Its end is to keep them informed, to make known their wishes, to provide means by which they may communicate with their fellow citizens for their mutual benefit, to supply their wants, and dispose of their wares at the least possible cost, in the shortest possible time, and with the greatest possible security.

The postal system of rates, regardless of distance, regardless of the character of the matter transported, and regardless of the volume of the patron's business, eminently fits it for this great service. That it will sooner or later be greatly extended is absolutely certain, and the people will duly appreciate the aid of those who assist in its extension and development for their benefit and advantage.

My bill is a meritorious measure. It raises the weight limit of the package from 4 pounds to 11 pounds, and reduces the postage on the parcel from 16 cents a pound to 8 cents a pound, and that was the postal rate for many years until the express companies doubled it in 1879.

During the past year the representatives of at least 10,000,000 American citizens, including the great agricultural associations of the country, National Grange, the Farmers' Union, the Farm-National Congress, Retail Dry Goods Association of New York, the Associated Retailers of St. Louis, the Manufacturing Perfumers of the United States, the American Florists' Association, and many others, appeared before the House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in favor of my bill, demanding a general parcel post as extended and as cheap as that provided by the Postmaster General in our foreign postal service. The hearing showed that the public wanted at least an 11-pound service at 8 cents a pound. Seldom, if ever, has any proposition received stronger public support, and it seems as if the House Committee on Post Offices begged the question when it reported the makeshift outlined in section 8 of the pending

There is no reason in the world why the people of the United States should be deprived of the advantages of this benign legislation for a general parcel post, that will bring producers and consumers in closer touch and be of inestimable benefit to all the people, especially those who dwell in the large cities and live in the producing sections of the country. It has been adopted in every European country, and it ought to be adopted It has been here. We have either made or are making postal conventions with the countries of the world by which their citizens can send through the mails to any part of the United States packages weighing 11 pounds at the universal postal rate, and the people of the United States are prohibited from doing the same thing because of our failure to enact a similar postal parcel It is a great injustice to the taxpayers of this country. It is a discrimination in favor of the foreigner against the citizen of the United States which is repugnant to my sense of justice. I am opposed to this inequality, and in order to obviate it I introduced my bill for a general parcel post. Postal Progress League has indorsed it, and as I have stated the representatives of over 10,000,000 taxpayers of this country appeared before the committee and urged its enactment. Why should the bill not be enacted into law?

The time is now at hand for Congress to heed the insistent demand of the people for a general parcel post along the lines of my bill, the express companies, the jobbers, the middlemen, and others to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Chairman, who is opposed to the general parcel post that the people want? I would like to know. Will somebody get up here and tell me? I pause for an answer. I have the figures and the statistics that will be used in the coming political campaign from one end of this country to the other. The question is squarely presented to us. We must say whether we are going to vote for the people and a general parcel post or for the express companies. The express companies dare not come down here and say they are opposed to a general parcel post. They would be laughed out of court. They know their presence here would do more than anything else to pass a general parcel-post bill

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SULZER. Yes; for a question.
Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The bill for the parcel-post

expres

Mr. SULZER. I am not talking about buying the express companies. That is not necessary. I listened to the gentle-man's discussion about roads, but I am talking about a general parcel post, and I do not care to be interrupted about matters that I am not talking about. Let me ask the gentleman if he is in favor or against a general parcel post?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I am in favor of a parcel post,

Mr. SULZER. A general parcel post?
Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. A general parcel post that will pay its own way. I am in favor of the zone system. Is the gentleman in favor of a flat rate all over the country?

Mr. SULZER, I am. That is what a general parcel post

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Then that is where we do

Mr. SULZER. Very well; we do not agree. Some people say they are in favor of giving the people a parcel post, but they want to confine it to a little section of the country. Some people say they are in favor of a parcel post, but they want to confine it to a little larger section of the country; and then there are some people who want a parcel post and are willing to extend it to a little larger section of the country. I want a parcel post for all the country—that will be as general as the postal system. The zone system simply begs the question and amounts to nothing at all if you do not increase the weight limit more than 11 pounds and reduce the rate to less than 8 cents a pound. All the testimony adduced before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all the testimony taken by the Post Office Committee, which is a matter of public record, goes to prove this conclusively. Years ago the same arguments were used against the 3-cent letter postage, and then against the 2-cent letter postage; and the same arguments will be made against a 1-cent letter postage. Rowland Hill, of England, was right when he said that once a postal service is in operation, the cost of its use is regardless the distance traversed upon the moving machinery by any unit of traffic within its capacity. The idea of charging higher postage on a letter or a parcel on account of the greater distance it travels is an absurdity

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. We monopolize the business of carrying let-No letter can go without a 2-cent stamp by post, and it could not go at all with the express company without a 2-cent stamp. Now, is the gentleman from New York in favor of monopolizing the business of the parcel post up to 11 pounds?

Mr. SULZER. Yes. I say the Government ought to have a monopoly of the parcel post up to 11 pounds. The post office is our mutual express company.

Mr. CANNON. I quite agree with the gentleman. Mr. SULZER. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. SULZER. 1 am glad to hear that.
Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SULZER. Yes.
Mr. MURDOCK. Does not the gentleman from New York think that without the monopoly the 11-pound proposition would not be workable?

Mr. SULZER. Well, that depends. At all events I am with the Government in this matter. I am in favor of the Govern-ment doing the postal business that the people intend the Government shall do.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does not the gentleman think that unless we took over the monopoly, after we had put in the new rates under the 11-pound provision, that we would get all the long hauls, where we would make no money, and the express companies would continue and get the short hauls?

Mr. SULZER. That will not amount to much if we adopt the amendment which I shall offer. If we adopt that amendment the Government will have a monopoly of the parcel-post business up to 11 pounds. If, however, we should adopt the rate of 12 cents a pound on the rural routes, as provided in the present bill, I do not think the Government will be able to monopolize the business, because the rates in the present bill are too high. In my general parcel-post bill which has been pending in Congress for a long time the flat rate of 8 cents a pound, in the opinion of experts, gives the Government all the advantage. You must remember that prior to 1879 the rate was 8 cents a pound, but the express companies had more to say then than they have now, and through their influence in Con-gress in 1879 the rate was changed from 8 to 16 cents a pound. This gave the express companies a monopoly. Change the rate back to 8 cents a pound for 11 pounds and I believe the Government will have the monopoly. Why should express companies be given a monopoly on the profitable parcel-carrying trade, while the postal department contents itself with the least profitable? Why should the Government give foreign 4-pound parcels a rate of 48 cents while we must pay 64 cents, regardless of distance? Why is it a package of any weight up to 11 pounds can be carried in our mails, if mailed in a foreign country, while we can mail but 4 pounds, and even then must pay 33½ per cent more? Why should the Post Office Depart-ment stagger under a deficit while the express companies take the cream-express companies that pay 100 and even 200 per cent profit, in spite of their extravagant and unscientific methods?

Let me say that many believe the express companies are carrying parcels in violation of the Federal statutes which prohibit this privilege to private persons. Their rates, at all events, are exorbitant, exceeding first-class freight rates in some cases 37½ times. The profits of this Government-fostered monopoly would wipe out our annual postal deficit, and enable the department to establish an immediate 1-cent letter rate.

Cheaper parcel transportation rates would be an unqualified benefit to all the people. The express companies have not openly shown opposition to the movement. It has appeared from officials of associations of wholesalers and retailers, mostly retailers of heavy-weight goods, paints, vehicles, lumber, farm machinery, etc., that could not move by parcel post if we had one.

Why should organizations of wholesalers and retailers, for the most part engaged in selling lumber, heavy hardware, and other nonpackage freight, incur expense in opposition to the parcel post when it would in no material way affect business except to benefit it? For an answer read their printed testimony given at the hearings

Their claim that the mail-order houses are behind the parcel-post movement, the better to flood the country with their goods to the injury of the small retailers, was not substantiated. On the contrary, it is shown that Sears, Roebuck Co., of Chicago, is opposed to the parcel post, as are other catalogue houses, and for a very good reason. They have built their business up on the 100-pound minimum freight weight charge and make use of the mail or express service but seldom. Consequently, the establishment of a parcel post would tend greatly to disturb their business and to help the village retailer who would make himself the local agency through which the parcel-post system would naturally operate.

The testimony at the hearing showed that the parcel-post system in England has not tended to create catalogue houses, nor has it in Germany or other countries tended to foster great department stores. It has done two things and has done them effectively. It has eliminated a costly and extravagant express monopoly and has greatly accommodated the general public, consumer, retailer, and wholesaler.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes. I want to put back the old rate of 8 cents a pound, the people's rate, and I want the Government to get the parcel business, and not the express companies.

Mr. BARTLETT. If, as the gentleman suggests, we have an 8-cent flat rate, will that not make the man who lives within 25 miles of the shipping point pay more than his proportion in comparison with the man who lives 1,000 miles away from the shipping point?

Mr. SULZER. I have explained that. When the machinery of postal transportation is in operation, distance has little to do with cost so far as maximum capacity is concerned. age haul of all parcels in the United States, according to the testimony which has been taken before the Interstate Commerce Commission, is 200 miles. That is, taking in all of the hauls throughout the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT. Very well; put it at 200 miles. If you have an 8-cents-a-pound flat rate will not the man who lives within 25 miles of the shipping point have to pay more than his due proportion of the rate in order that the man who lives 200 miles away may get it at 8 cents a pound?

Mr. SULZER. Not to any greater extent than he now does on postage

Mr. BARTLETT. Else you will have to make the Government carry it at a loss.

Mr. SULZER. The same rule that applies to carrying a letter or a newspaper applies to a small parcel.

Mr. BARTLETT. You make the man pay for a short haul as much as the man pays for a long haul.

Mr. SULZER. As Rowland Hill said, when the postal transport service is in operation the distance is immaterial.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to put a concrete question. Supposing his bill were enacted into law, and the gentleman wanted to send from here to Alexandria—which is across the river—a package of 11 pounds. It would cost 88 cents. Does not the gentleman think that that would be exorbitant and unreasonable-entirely too high?

Mr. SULZER. No more so in comparison than the cost for a letter carried the same distance.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, there is no comparison.

Mr. SULZER. In dealing in a big, broad way with a general parcel post no distinction should be made in principle between a letter and a package.

Mr. NORRIS. But the gentleman ought to make a distinction.

There is a very great difference.

Mr. SULZER. Those who understand the question are familiar with the fundamental law of economics promulgated and established by Mr. Hill years ago. Let me say over again that as far back as 1837 Rowland Hill, of England, promulgated to the world the economic law that once a public transport service is in operation the cost of its use is regardless of the distance traversed upon the moving machinery by any unit of traffic within its capacity. That principle is so well understood to-day by every student of political economy that it can not now be successfully questioned or controverted. A general parcel post, once established with reasonable rates, regardless of distance, regardless of the character of the matter transported, and regardless of the volume of the patron's business, is eminently fitted for great service to the people. That it should be extended over the entire field of postal transportation is absolutely. certain.

In this connection I want to say that the Interstate Com-merce Commission has made a very thorough investigation of the question. The data obtained are so complete and so conclusive that I see no reason for the provision in this bill for the appointment of another commission to make a further investigation. It is unnecessary. We have all the figures, all the statistics, all the information that we can possibly get about this subject of a general parcel post. If a new commission should sit for the next 10 years it could not give this House any more information upon the subject than we have now.

What does the investigation of the express companies before the Interstate Commerce Commission show? It is shown that the nine express companies own $54,000,000 of railroad securities, that they own $25,000,000 of express securities, and that they own $11,000,000 of securities of other common carriers, a total of $91,000,000 of stocks and bonds of railroads and other The value of the stock of these companies common carriers. to-day is considerably over $300,000,000. How are you going to take away the property of the express companies under the Constitution of the United States, as provided in the Goeke bill, unless you give the express companies what the property is reasonably worth? Do the gentlemen who advocate the Goeke bill think they can confiscate the property of the express companies?
Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Just a moment. I want to make this clear. The reason I am opposed to buying out the express companies is because it will cost too much and is not necessary, and because I believe it is a mere subterfuge to prevent or delay the establishment of a genuine parcel post.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment

Mr. SULZER. I yield.

Does not the gentleman's own bill contain a Mr. LEWIS. provision upon that subject?

Mr. SULZER. No. There is nothing in my bill about buying out the express companies. My bill is a general parcel-post measure, pure and simple.

The investigation of express companies by the Interstate Commerce Commission shows that the express tonnage of the country last year amounted to 660,000 tons, of which 34 per cent was packages weighing under 11 pounds. Think of that. Of all the express business done in the United States last year over 34 per cent was in packages under 11 pounds in weight, and it is on the small packages that the express companies make their largest profits. Give the Government the right to carry ex-clusively the packages not exceeding 11 pounds in weight and I say it will bring into the Treasury revenue of over $50,000,000 The post-office officials say between $35,000,000 and $50,000,000 a year. Think of that revenue, all of which would go to maintain the Post Office Department.

Let me show further. The weight of these packages was not 11 pounds, but 34 per cent of all the merchandise carried by the express companies last year was of an average weight of 4 pounds per package.

The number of these packages handled by the express companies weighing 11 pounds and under was 100,000,000, weighing Turn that immense business over to the Post Office Department at 8 cents a pound and see what a tremendous revenue it is going to bring in, not only enough revenue to maintain the postal transportation system, but profit enough to make a surplus of $50,000,000 every year.

We have this postal transport service established. We have as good a postal transport service to-day for carrying general parcels as the express companies. This House knows how much money is paid to the railroads every year for carrying the mail. We would have to pay a very little more to carry postal How much money do the express companies pay to the railroads every year for carrying their express packages? We would not have to do that, because we pay the railroads now over $50,000,000 every year for carrying the mails and we will have to pay them very little, if anything, more for carrying the postal packages. The railroads must run the trains, the mail cars are a part of the service, and the mail cars may as well be utilized to their maximum carrying capacity as to run them daily with only a few mail bags. It will not require many more men to look after the parcels than it now does to look after the mail, so the cost will be but little, if any, more than it is at present. The postal transport machinery is in existence; all that is necessary to do is to provide the merchandise, and it only remains for Congress to do that by standing by the people and not by the express companies.

Give back to the people the old law of 1879 that we had before the express companies took it from the people, and increase the weight from 4 to 11 pounds, at 8 cents a pound, and in one year we will have a general parcel post in this country which will bring in additional revenue over and above its expenses of $50,000,000, and if there is a friend of the taxpayer here who is not in favor of that I would like to know who he is. Let him stand up and be counted.

But let me go on. This investigation gives an analysis of the freight revenue of a day's business of one express company and shows-I have gone to considerable trouble to get these figures. And they have been checked up by Judge Williams, of Arkan-sas—shipments, not over 7 pounds in weight, originating and terminating with this company on which graduate charges were assessed. The average weight per piece was 3.62 pounds and the average charge was 36.74 cents per piece. On shipments not over 7 pounds handled by more than one company on which a single graduate charge was assessed the average weight was 3.43 pounds per piece and the average charge was 48.22 cents per piece, and on shipments of similar weight between New York, extending to all points of the country, the average weight per piece was 3.6 and the average charge was 28.39 cents per piece.

These figures show conclusively that the flat rate-mark you, this is not my testimony; it is the testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commissioners; it is the judgment they have formed after spending months in making the investigations of these express companies—these figures, I say, show conclusively that the flat rate of 12 cents a pound, as proposed in the present bill, even taking into consideration that such rates contemplate, evidently, the carriage of packages to points not yet reached by the express service, are entirely too high and that the rate ought to be, as provided in my bill, 8 cents a pound. Of course, 12 cents a pound is too high. A 12-cents-apound rate will not hurt the express companies. An 8-cents-apound rate will give the Government the business, and that is what I want to do.

It is because I realize the force of these truths so keenly that I am so persistent in urging favorable consideration of my bill for a general parcel post. Its only fault, in my opinion, is its conservatism. What this country now needs, what Congress should give it, is a general parcel post covering all the business of postal transportation, with a maximum weight of 11 pounds, at 8 cents a pound.

It is ridiculous for anybody to say that the Government can not do a general parcel-post business. It is too preposterous for argument. Of course the Government can do it, and can do it a great deal better and a good deal cheaper and more advantageously than the express company. The Government has a contract with the railways by which the railways must carry the mail—the parcel post is mail. The mail now goes for thousands of miles all over the country. What do the mail cars contain? A few sacks of mail; that is all. The mail cars should be utilized to their maximum capacity. That is economy. They ought to be filled with mail-parcels and letters. We are paying the railroads; the mail cars are ours. We ought to utilize them to their maximum capacity and to their utmost efficiency. We are not doing it now. Why are we not doing it? Because the express companies are doing the parcel post business of the Government. You can see how cheaply the Government can do it. We do not need many more employees to do it. All we need is to do our duty and pass the law; that is all we have to do. It is a simple thing. All these governmental questions are simple when you are honest about them and when you want to do right.

There is nothing complicated about a general parcel post. Twenty-three of the great Governments of the world have a general parcel post to-day and it works like a charm in the interests of the people, and every one of the citizens of these 23 great Governments of the world can send a package weighing 11 pounds to any part of the United States for about 8 cents a pound. The people of the United States can not do it. Why? Because the express companies wrote the law that prevents it.

That law has cost the people of this country not hundreds of millions of dollars but billions of dollars. Talk about the profits of the express companies! They have made so much money by reason of that law that if a man owned 1,000 shares of the stock of Adams Express Co. in 1885, and had carried it from that day to this he would be rich to-day beyond the fears of want. all events he would never have to work any more. Think of that! The express companies have made their profits, their wealth, all out of the people. The question presented to us now is whether we will permit it any longer. I want to stop it. I want to give the Government a chance now. That is why I do not want to complicate this general parcel post with the proposition of buying the express companies and railroads. If the Government buys the express companies, the next thing it will have to do is to buy the railroads. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Berger] told the truth about it. But where is the money coming from?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] has expired.

Mr. SULZER. I ask for a few minutes more. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from New York that there are so many requests for time from other gentlemen that I can not give him more than a couple of minutes

Mr. SULZER. Let me have 10 minutes.
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If I gave the gentleman 10 minutes, I would have to take it from others to whom I have promised time.

Mr. SULZER. Well, five minutes will do. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. All right; take five minutes.

Mr. SULZER. The people are not asking us to buy out the express companies. The people want the express companies to keep out of their postal business—the Government business of carrying the mail. That is all. They do not want to issue bonds to buy out the express companies for $30,000,000 or $300,000,000. Some Members tell us it will only cost about $30,000,000 to buy the express companies. I say it will cost nearer $300,000,000. I speak advisedly; make no mistake about that. Let the ex-I speak advisedly; make no mistake about that. press companies alone after you pass a law to allow the Government to do its post-office business. I have no desire to start the Government in the express business, and to do it buy out all the express companies at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars. I want the Government to do its own postal businessthe post-office business. That is all.

The express companies do not fool me. I know their methods. But I have no personal grievance against them. I do not want to do them an injury. But I am in Congress representing the people, not the express companies. The people elected me to Congress. I am trying to the best of my ability to honestly represent the people and to promote their welfare. I would rather write a few good constructive laws for the people on the statute books of my country than have the plaudits of all the express companies in America. So much for the express

Now another matter. There comes a cry now and then from here and there from some little country merchant who does not want a general parcel post established because some agent of the express companies tells him it will injure him and be in the interests of the mail-order houses. The mail-order houses! What mail-order houses in the United States are clamoring for a general parcel post? I know not, Is John Wanamaker? No. Is Macy's? No. I am a friend of John Wanamaker. He is a great man, an honest merchant, and a public-spirited citizen. John Wanamaker is more of a patriot than he is a money-maker. He told me in his great New York store not long ago that he does not do a mail-order business-never did and never will-and very few department stores in the big cities do; yet in the interests of the people he favors a general parcel post.

Some of these little country merchants are unnecessarily alarmed. Why are they scared? Because some agents of the express companies-not doing the thing openly-have started little agencies in Chicago, in New Orleans, in St. Louis, and other cities, and these agencies are busy, day in and day out, sending plate matter and typewritten letters and resolutions to the little country merchant to the effect that if this parcelpost bill becomes a law the mail-order houses in the large cities will get all the business. I have taken the trouble to write to several of these country merchants, and I have told them the truth about the general parcel post, and have told them how it is in their interest, and that if they did not believe what I said to investigate it carefully. They have answered: "Mr. Sulzer, we did not understand it before. The typewritten matter we sent you came to us in an envelope, with a request for us to sign it and mail it to a Congressman. We did so. We thought it was to our interest, and so we signed it and sent it to our Congressman; but now we know the truth, and we are in favor of the general parcel post."

I am a friend of the country merchant. I was born in the country and I know the country merchant. I would do nothing to injure him. What will this general parcel-post bill do? I will tell you what it will do. The general parcel post may hurt, to some extent, the express companies. It may burt, to some extent, the middlemen; but I am not legislating for the welfare of the middlemen or for the good of the express companies. I am legislating for the people—for the consumer—and I know that a general parcel post will bring the producer and the manufacturer and the consumer closer together, and go far to cheapen the cost of the necessaries of life; and any bill that will bring the producer and the consumer closer together and cheapen the cost of the necessaries of life to the people of America always did and always will have my support. · [Loud applause, l

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to my colleague [Mr. Sims].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in order to settle the parcel-post matter as far as I am concerned, I will begin by saying I am going to vote for the bill of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sulzer] if it is offered as an amendment, because if it is going to do as much good as he represents-and he seems to have the information on which to base his statement-I do not think we ought to let it fail for lack of votes.

I suppose, then, if the postal express provision known as the Goeke bill becomes a law, as it also can be voted for on this bill, we will certainly have ample facilities to do that kind of business.

I do not wish to discuss these measures myself, for the reason that there are other gentlemen who are well prepared to discuss I take it the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] will discuss his own measure at length, and I want to assure you that there is nobody in the House better prepared to do it than he is.

shall confine my remarks entirely to the provision of the bill that is called the good-roads provision. I wish I could so regard that measure as a bill making it imperative to have better roads than there are in some places in this country. The bill proposed as an amendment to this bill is as follows:

That for the purposes of this act certain highways of the several States, and the civil subdivisions thereof, are classified as follows:

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide composed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, graded, crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface, and all other roads having a road track not less than 9 feet wide of a construction equally smooth, firm, durable, and expensive, and continuously kept in proper repair. Class B shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length, upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track not less than 9 feet wide, composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface. Class C shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length upon which no grade shall be steeper than is reasonably and practicably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with ample side ditches, so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $25 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class B, and $15 per annum per mile for highways of class C. The United States shall not pay any compensation or toll for such use of such highways other than that provided for in this section, and shall pay no compensation whatever for the use of any highway not falling within classes A, B, or C. That any question arising as to the proper classification of any road used for transporting rural mail shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. That the compensation herein provided for shall be paid at the end of each fiscal year by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Postmaster General to the officers entitled to the custody of the funds of the respective highways entitled to compensation under this act.

The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July 1013 The provisions of this paragraph shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913.

The bill proposes that we pay $25 a mile for roads falling within class A, as an annual rental for the use of those roads for the rural mail service that may be performed on them, or so much of them as is so used.

I want to know if that $25 a mile for those roads will, by reason of its payment, increase the Federal function performed thereon? Will there be an increased rural mail service on those roads by reason of this $25 a year paid as rent? Will the salaries of the rural carriers be reduced so as to save the expenses incurred by paying this rent? Will the length of the route be increased by reason of paying $25 a year rent on that kind of a road?

It is said somewhere on very high authority that the love of money is the root of all evil-not money, but the love of it.

The States are sovereign to the extent that they have not surrendered sovereignty to the General Government. The General Government is a government of limited powers, and can do nothing that is not authorized in the Constitution. I have never yet believed that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that Federal taxes should be collected for any other purpose than to discharge Federal obligations-obligations that are national in character. Now, I want to know why we should make a distinction and pay for roads of class B $20 a mile. Does the rural carrier over such a road perform less service to the people than the one who goes over class A, a $25 a mile per annum road? Then, coming down to class C, I want to ask you if the rural carrier on a road of class C will not do just as much Federal business as a rural carrier who goes over a road receiving the $25 a mile rent?

Now, call it what we please and think of it as we may, really on these roads of the various classes now in existence we do on these roads of the various classes now in existence we do not, by paying this rent, additionally facilitate nor add to any existing rural service. Without paying any rent on roads of this kind, the functions of the rural mail carrier will be fully discharged. Is not that true? And if we had the parcel post or the parcel express mentioned in the rule making it in order to be offered as an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill, the service required by this additional burden on the rural carrier can be fully discharged on any of the classes mentioned. Therefore it is not necessary, to perform the Federal function of carrying the mails or parcels by the rural carrier, that we should pay rent on the classes of roads provided in the proposed amendment.

My friends, the only authority we have to do anything on this subject under the Constitution is the following: In defining the powers of Congress, one is "to establish post offices and post roads." What does that word "establish" mean? I am a Democrat. I think I am at least one of the "57 varieties," and I do not wear the Constitution as a hobble skirt to fall down in every time I turn around or try to walk; but having taken an oath of office to support the Constitution, I do not want to undertake to do something for which I can find no constitutional warrant. I understand the word "establish" has been construed by the courts to mean the power to construct and main-Under that section we collect taxes and appropriate them to build a post office.

What is a post office? It is a building for the purpose of collecting and distributing the mail. Is not that all of it? The function of performing the mail service being a Federal function, the post office is an incident necessary to it. What is a rural carrier? He is in effect a postmaster. He discharges the functions in part of a postmaster. A postmaster stays in the post-office building and receives and distributes the mail. The rural carrier gets on a horse or a mule or into a vehicle, takes the mail out over the designated rural route, and distributes and collects. The mail car that goes over the railroad is a traveling post office. The mail clerk therein is performing the functions of a postmaster or a clerk in a stationary post office.

We must determine what a thing is from its use. The duties of a rural carrier and a mail clerk and of a city carrier are along the lines of receiving, collecting, and distributing the mail. These acts of service are all Federal and not State.

Now, I think we have the power to appropriate any money necessary to the complete discharge of this Federal function of collecting and distributing the mail. If we have the power and authority to build a post office, we have the power and authority to use the public money in any other way that is necessary to facilitate the distribution and collection of the mail.

The function of the rural carrier is to go over a designated route and collect and distribute the mail. If the route is impassible, I think this constitutional provision authorizing us to appropriate money to establish post roads authorizes us to make make a building possible to perform the service that is required to be performed in a building.

Therefore the Constitution is not in my way, because I believe we have the power under that clause of the Constitution to absolutely build a road from start to finish without any aid whatever from the locality or the people who patronize that route.

Then, if we have the right constitutionally to own directly and absolutely we have the right to lease; we have the power to rent, and to pay out money for it.

But that is all for the purpose of enabling the Government to do something that it could not do without the expenditure. We build the post office, or rent it, to enable the postmaster to perform the functions that could not be performed without it. hire the rural carrier to go out and receive and distribute the mail, because we could not do it otherwise. It is the same way with the city carrier, with the railway mail clerk—all of them perform functions that inhere in the service. So I think we have the constitutional power to rent, if it is necessary, in order to perform the service.

Now, I want to ask my friends who are in favor of this bill, if it does not pass, Is there 1 mile of road in the United States within these classifications on which the service is now performed that it will cease to be performed or be performed less efficiently?

Now, then, do you want as economical Democrats to go home to your people and say to them that we paid $25 a mile for the rent of a road that we did not need and did not have to have and which added nothing in the way of discharging a Federal duty? Then why is it done? Why, Massachusetts, according to the latest report I have, has 49 per cent of her roads that would come within these three classes. Is there any doubt that Massachusetts would claim the money on all these roads if this bill passes?

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Has the gentleman any public buildings erected in his district since he has been a Member of Congress? Mr. SIMS. One.

Was it erected where the Government was HAMLIN. not able to obtain any other building?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then they could have done without the ap-

Mr. SIMS. Yes; the service would have gone on. They could have rented an old building, but the business had increased, and it got to where it was not sufficient and there was no building in town that could be rented sufficiently large to do the business. This was in Paris, Tenn. I introduced and voted for the bill, and I would vote for another just like-it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does the gentleman from Tennessee oppose this bill because of economy, because he does not think that we ought to pay out the money?

Mr. SIMS. Now, if the gentleman from South Carolina will give me the opportunity I will tell him just exactly why I oppose it unamended. Now, I want to ask you, Can we go to the country and say that we were wise in voting money out of the Treasury that goes in through Federal taxes if it is not necessary to perform any Federal duty? I know what is claimed for this proposed amendment. It is claimed to be to encourage the States and counties and municipalities to build roads or to so improve them as that they will fall within one of the rental classes; to put money enough on roads to sufficiently improve them so that if they happen to be used by rural carriers or the star-route earriers they will get this rent. That is an indirect way of bringing about road building for State purposes wholly within the State by Federal taxation. It does not matter what you call it.

Let me ask you-take a road that is already built. You are going to get $25 per mile per year for it for all time to come. You are not simply building a road and then stopping the ex- it not?

pense except for maintenance after it is completed, as they do with a post office; but this is $25 a mile, and it goes on as long as the Government goes on or until Congress repeals the law. What is the object of it, my friends? It is to get those States that have a high percentage of improved roads to vote for this bill. Is not that really the practical object and purpose of it?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.
Mr. LEVER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can differentiate between the idea of this bill and the fact that we are now paying to the railroad companies a rent for the use of their property and also to private individuals for the use of the pneumatic-tube service in the city of Chicago, as pointed out by my friend from Illinois, Mr. MADDEN?

Mr. SIMS. Why, in the easiest way in the world. not paying a railroad company to carry any mail if there is no mail to carry on that road. We are not paying a railroad any more than it asks, are we? We are not paying a railroad a dollar except to perform an equivalent Government service. Is that not true?

Mr. LEVER. We are paying the railroad company so much as the contract calls for which was entered into between the two parties-the Government on the one side and the railroad on the other.

Mr. SIMS. Is not the object and purpose of that contract that the railroad company shall render a Federal service equivalent to the Federal pay that is received?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from South Carolina will give me more time; I have only 30 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Just answer this one question.

Very well.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman makes a distinction that nobody is asking for it. Are not the people of the country now asking for it through their Representatives, and will the gentleman tell me frankly whether he is in favor of the Government aiding in the building of roads-yes or noin any form?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I can answer the question without using only two words, and I will answer it before I get through, and then I will give the gentleman something to vote for.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman answer me shortly whether he is in favor of it or not?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I know what that means. I will ask the gentleman if he is in favor of it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman tell me whether he is in favor of it and whether he has told his people at home that he is in favor of it?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I will tell the gentleman my people know as much about my position as does the gentleman.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman whether the framers of the Constitution contemplated that the Federal Government should build roads or that the State government should build the roads.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know what the framers of the Constitution meant when they made the provision about establishing and maintaining post roads. I do not know whether that meant that the Government should carry mail over certain designated lines or that the Congress should physically construct a post road.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Did it not mean that it was purely a Federal policy and should be borne by Federal expense?

Mr. SIMS. Of course, I have already said that the carrying of the mail and the delivery of it is wholly a Federal function, and that we have a constitutional power to provide for it fully and completely.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SIMS. It is impossible for me to yield to everybody and complete my remarks.

Mr. HOWARD. Has not this Congress construed the words "establish post offices and post roads," as far office is concerned, to mean the building of them? as far as the post

Mr. SIMS. I said that a few moments ago, and the gentle-man would know that if he had been listening to me—not the Congress, but the courts. I have said we can build these roads, and that we can rent them.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, right on that point I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I usually find myself in accord with the gentleman from Tennessee.

If the Government of this country had the right to build these roads, that would carry with it the right to control them, would

Mr. SIMS. So far as the Federal use is concerned, and no farther.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does not the gentleman prefer if we give aid toward the building of these roads we should do it in such a way as to leave the control absolutely in the States rather than in the Federal Government?

Mr. SIMS. I will say—
Mr. HAMLIN. And would not that plan be a better plan than for the Government to build the roads?

Mr. SIMS. Now, the bill on its face does not make it conditional to use one dollar of this money in the improvement of roads, either in paying for constructing or maintaining them. Now let us see. Suppose you have got a class B road. Five dollars a mile is the only difference in rent between a class A and a class B road. Would that cause anybody in charge of that road to spend $500 or $1,000 per mile additional in order to get $5 more per mile in rents? Just drop down to class B, where you get $20, then drop to class C and he will still get $15. The difference in the amount of rent provided does not cover the difference in costs of the roads and will not be of any practical inducement if the road is of class B to build it up to class A, or from class C to class B.

Now, how are you encouraging the improvement of roads? In the first place, you do not need any improvement in classes A, B, and C, so far as use by the Federal Government is concerned. Now, I have assumed that we have the power under cerned. I have assumed that we have the power under the Constitution to build roads necessary to the performance of Federal requirements, or to own them, to operate and to main-Now, I want to know what roads need improvement tain them. most, in order to expedite the Federal service. Not one of the classes here mentioned needs any improvement whatever that is necessary to its use for Federal purposes. There is not a State in the Union with a mile of road coming in any of these classes that the people have petitioned this Congress to pay rent for their use. Now, it seems to me, in view of the fact that a parcel-post service of some sort will soon be established, or a parcel-express service will be established, and that the roads provided for in this bill do not need any additional improvement in order to perform such service and knowing full well that there are hundreds of thousands of miles of roads that are being used by rural carriers that do need improvement and are located in localities where the people, in justice to themselves and the other burdens they have to bear, are not able to build class C, class A, or class B roads, and therefore will be deprived of any benefit under this bill. Now, there is no use in being afraid of Federal interference. It seems to me that the Federal Treasury needs to be in fear of State interference instead of the States being afraid of Federal interference. Wherever the dollar leads, there is a way; and so New England and some of our beloved Members of Congress from the South and East decided they wanted to improve the navigation of the Atlantic Ocean by buying the tops of the White Mountains and others to promote a slow descent of the rainfall. [Laughter.] Now, why not have the courage of your desires and provide straight out that any road used to carry rural mail is hereby declared a post road, and then authorize the Postmaster General, by and with the cooperation and consent of the State and local authorities, to improve that road up to the standard of class C without any reference to what its costs per mile?

Now, in my own beloved State under the class of sand-clay roads, which are without gravel or macadam, in Green County it cost $1,250 per mile to build. In Madison County, in my district, it cost $1,500 a mile to build it, and in Sumner County, Judge Hull's district, it cost $400 a mile to build. Now, with $15 a mile rent it is $15 on a $1,500 investment in Madison County and $15 on a $400 investment in Sumner County. You can not fairly and justly reimburse the counties, States, and municipalities for roads that they have already built unless you put the rent on a percentage basis of cost. Now look at maput the rent on a percentage basis of cost. Now look at hacadam roads. A macadam road in Madison County, in my district-I am reading from a bulletin of mileage and cost of public roads in the United States, 1909, by J. A. Pennypacker, chief of road management, January 1, 1911—the cost of macadam roads in Madison County, in my district, was $5,100 a mile on the average. The cost of macadam roads in Sumner County, in Judge Hull's district, was $700 a mile. If you are going to reimburse the people of Madison County justly and fairly, you must reimburse them to the same extent on the investment that you do Sumner County.

Mr. LEVER. The proposition is not to reimburse, but rent-for use of the property.

Mr. SIMS. Show me any request from anybody for pay for the rural carrier going over these roads.

Mr. LEVER. The committee that had charge of this matter can show 40 Members of Congress, representing that many constituencies.

Mr. SIMS. Look under the head of gravel roads of Pennsylvania and look at the difference in costs. In the Berks Township district the gravel roads cost $400 a mile; in Muhlenberg Township the gravel roads cost $3,000 a mile. There is no uniformity in cost; no uniformity in outlay whatever. Here is a flat rate of return, or bounty, or subsidy, or rent, whatever you call it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me ask the gentleman on that very point. Do you make any distinction as to the railroads that take into consideration the cost of one road as compared with the cost of another?

Mr. SIMS. Not a bit.

Mr. HAMLIN. If you do not in railroad service, why do you in other service?

Mr. SIMS. Because we do not pay any more for railroad service than is necessary to get the service performed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Sims] has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] for additional time. He knows that I have been interrupted very much.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am sorry you are interrupted by so many gentlemen. I will give you five minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Give me 10.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Well, I will give you 10.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I propose the following amendment to what is carried in the bill. It may not on its own merits be a wise amendment. I certainly think it is more defensible and wiser than the provisions in the bill, and I understand that the bill can be amended. As I see it the whole effect of this is to get money out of the Treasury of the United States for local State purposes.

I will read my proposed amendment:

I will read my proposed amendment:

That for the purposes of this act all highways of the several States and the civil subdivisions thereof, or any parts of same used by the United States for the purpose of transporting rural mall not hereinbefore mentioned and described, are hereby declared to be post roads.

That the Postmaster General under such rules and regulations as may be provided by him, by and with the cooperation and consent of the State and county or other local authorities having charge of the construction, operation, and maintenance of such roads shall, by contract or otherwise, cause all such roads or parts of roads not so improved by said States or local authorities, to be provided with ample side ditches so constructed and crowned as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, and to be continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means.

That for the purpose of carrying out this provision of this act the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Now, this is a direct authorization to improve roads that need it. That brings or authorizes the bringing up of every road traveled and used for rural mail to the standard of class C in this bill. Are you opposed to it?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is a pretty good buncombe amend-

Mr. SIMS. It is a pretty good buncombe amendment, says the entleman from Georgia. Then I know it is in a class with all gentleman from Georgia. Then I know it is in a class with all other provisions of the bill, because, if it is buncombe, they are all buncombe, as the amendment I proposed is really needed, while none of the others are needed in order to have the required service performed.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is right.

Mr. SIMS. Class C is the lowest class provided for. Why do you Members who live in rural districts want the carriers in your districts to plod through mud and ice because the counties in which their routes are situated are not able to bring their roads up to class C? He carries the mail on schedule time, and it costs him more money on account of necessary equipment on account of the horses he kills.

Why not give this man, who has not a mile of road on his route of class A, B, or C, an improved road? Why pay rent to those who do not ask it and which does not result in benefiting the road on which the rent is paid, and let these other roads go without any improvement whatever because the localities are not able to do it?

Now, take a small county like Perry, in my own district, with 8,015 people, with 400 miles of road to keep up. There are more miles per capita and per dollar of taxable property five times over than in some of the other counties in my district, and yet they have to have this Federal service performed, and the rural carriers in that small county are as much entitled to Federal money to improve the roads over which they labor as the man who travels on the automobile Appian Ways in the Eastern States. You may challenge the wisdom of either of these propositions if you want to do so, but one is necessary to the service to be performed by the rural carriers while the

Mr. COX of Ohio. Will not the gentleman's amendment give the discretionary power to the Postmaster General?

Mr. SIMS. It authorizes and directs him to improve any roads that Mr. COX of Ohio. Any road which in his judgment-

Mr. SIMS. You have got to have somebody's judgment. It authorizes and directs him to improve any road, which, in his judgment, falls below class C, by bringing it up to class C.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Then is it not apt to become a sort of campaign fund, if it is subject entirely to his discretion?
Mr. SIMS. Oh, if that is what you are afraid of, it might be charged that $15 or $20 or $25 per mile rent can also be used in that way.

Now, further, the bill you are proposing here does not carry one dime of appropriation to put it into execution. The Committee on Appropriations has got to appropriate to pay your rent bill after the amount of rent is fixed. I will not say they will not do it. But why not deal with the people straight and

Mr. BARTLETT. Where will you get the money?
Mr. SIMS. Appropriate it out of the Treasury.
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that this bill does not go into effect until July 1, 1913.

Mr. SIMS. Then I will be ahead of you. By my amendment I will have the roads made ready before the law goes into effect. There will be plenty of money in the Mr. COX of Ohio. There will be plenty of money in the Treasury by July 1, 1913.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask the gentleman how many rural mail boxes are there in the district of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. LEVER. I do not know.

Mr. SIMS. There are thousands of them. Every one of them is under Federal control. It is made a Federal offense to tear down one of those boxes—an offense punishable in the Federal courts. Notwithstanding this fact, nobody refuses rural service. This improvement is authorized by the Postmaster General, by and with the cooperation and consent of the local State authorities, for the improvement of the roads. It does not per segive the Government control of it. We will have to pass supplementary legislation in order to do that. If we do, we will do what we had to do with reference to the Rural Free Delivery If anyone tears down a rural mail box, he is subject to indictment, although the Government does not own the box.

Mr. RUBEY. Is the gentleman sincere in advocating the amendment he offers?

I will vote for it and do all I can to put it in the bill. Mr. RUBEY. Has not the gentleman said that he would shoot the bill full of holes by amendments?

Mr. SIMS. No; shoot it full of holes by arguments. Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman said "amendments."

Mr. SIMS. Oh, somebody put that into my mouth. Nobody said that seriously.

Mr. RUBEY. Then it was done jocularly.

Mr. SIMS. Here is a proposition that is workable and is not dependent on anybody's classification. We will get back immediately the money spent on the roads. Why object to it? Why pay these automobile Appian Ways $25 a mile as rent, while refusing to accept my amendment?

Mr. RUBEY. I would like to ask the gentleman one more nestion. The gentleman is in favor, I understand, of the Government aiding in the building of public roads?

Not as a general proposition, only as to post roads. Mr. RUBEY. And if this amendment which the gentleman has offered fails, eventually he will be found not voting with us in the passage of this pending bill?

Mr. SIMS. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. RUBEY. I ask the gentleman if that is not so? Mr. SIMS. Well, I cross bridges only when I come to them. Mr. SIMS. Well, I cross bridges only when I come a laughter.] That bridge may never be reached. I say, as far another. [Laughter.] as I am able to understand the law, we have no power to levy Federal taxes and pay them out for roads except when those roads are post roads, and rural routes are the only post roads Therefore, I am in favor of voting for an amendment to improve those roads—all that is necessary in the performance of the Federal service now performed on them, or any service authorized to be performed on them, by the establishment of a percel past or parcel arrange. Hishment of a parcel post or parcel express.

I have discussed the same proposition for six years in my district, and if anybody wants to know anything about my position there, all he has to do is to read my speeches. I have always opposed the half-and-half business. I have always opposed the Federal construction of roads without a Federal purpose behind it, without a Federal object in view. I may be wrong. This amendment that I have proposed may be unwise, but I say it is constitutional, and it has the merit of doing that which it professes to do. It builds roads instead of renting roads already built. The pending bill forces the rural carrier in counties not able to build good roads to plod along in the rain and snow and get no more pay than before.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes left.
Mr. SIMS. Now, I do not know that I can add anything to what I have said in two minutes, but-

Mr. HAMLIN. In that case, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does not the gentleman think that if this bill became a law it would have the effect of encouraging people in his district, who have no good roads, to build good roads?

Mr. SIMS. I will tell my friend that I went down to the bureau of the Department of Agriculture in charge of public roads, and I asked the engineers what it would cost in parts of my district, where it is hill, hollow, and valley, the same as in east Tennessee, to build roads of class C, as provided in this bill, and I was told that it would cost from $1,000 to $2,000 a mile. My people who have not got these roads are not able to build them at that price, bonded or otherwise; and $15 a mile is no inducement to expend $2,000 a mile.

Now, my friends, I am sincere about this. I am not opposed to giving what it is within our constitutional power to give, but I see no other way to do it. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman can add about $20,000,000 to his provision for expense, and then not cover the necessities of the case

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, as part of my remarks, I desire to have inserted in the Record the statement made by Mr. Oscar F. Nelson, president of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, of Chicago, Ill., in the hearings before sub-committee No. 1 of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, that permission will be granted.

There was no objection.

The statement of Mr. Nelson, referred to, is as follows:

THE NEED FOR LEGISLATION THAT WILL REGULATE OUR HOURS OF LABOR.

The statement of Mr. Nelson, referred to, is as follows:

The Need for legislation that will regulate our hours of labor. For years the post-office clerks have been petitioning the department to recommend to this committee that legislation be enacted that would regulate our hours of labor and define just how many hours shall constitute a day's work. In the past and at present there is no legislation on the subject, and while it is generally understood and taken for granted by the public that the Government employees are not required to work more than eight hours a day, and that Congress has by law recognized that eight hours is a just standard for a day's work and has provided that the employees of the Government shall not be required to work more than eight hours to earn a day's pay, yet both the public and seemingly Congress have overlooked the fact that there is nothing on the statute books that limits or defines the number of hours that shall constitute a day's work for post-office clerks.

We are the only Government employees, absolutely the only exceptions, as far as I have been able to learn, that are not protected by legislation in that regard. We can be required, and we have in the past and at present are required, to work 9, 10, 11 and more hours a day. The department or any postmaster can, by reason of the fact that we are paid by the year, and there being no law that defines or regulates our hours of labor, work us 24 hours each day if that was physically possible.

No recommendation has ever been made by the department in response to our petitions for legislation regulating our hours of labor. Why? Because every department head in the past has been anxious to economize somewhere in the expenditures, and very naturally they have tried to economize at the point of least resistance, and that point of least resistance has been the employee, especially the clerks. No one ever sees the clerks; very few of the public have the slightest iden of a post-office clerk's duties. The clerk does not come in conta net amenable under the act that provides that laborers and mechanics shall not work more than eight hours a day. We have said, and we do now say, that the classification of us as "officials" does not compensate us for the long hours worked; neither does it restore our shattered health nor restore those whose lives have been shortened between the compensation of the long hours worked; neither does it restore our shattered health nor restore those whose lives have been shortened between the compensation of the long of the labor; and we are as skilled in our line of work as the most skilled mechanic found anywhere.

The wage centres of the Nation noted with satisfaction and appreciation the action of the House only a few weeks ago when you passed two work while not be permitted to work their employees on such work more than eight hours for a day's pay." That was a declaration by this present Congress as to its belief in the justice and benefits of the dight hour day stundard and should be performed the same.

In the large first-class offices some clerks are assigned to one class of work exclusively, such as selling stamps, issuing money orders, or distributions in the large citted an clerk self stamps, issuing money orders, or distributions in the large citted a clerk selfs stamps, issuing change as rapidly as the clerk, in way of loss, a sum equal to three days' pay. clerk does more studying and of a more difficult and disinteresting nature than does the average professional man in mastering and keeping up knowledge of his profession, whether it be medicine, law, or dentistry.

The time given to this study by the clerks at home is never taken into consideration by the department in estimating hours of work. Many clerks have become unbalanced of mind and committed to asylums because of the constant study required.

I respectfully ask in all fairness that you give consideration to the study required of the clerks when passing judgment as to whether we are not entitled to an eight-hour day.

The department undoubtedly is in possession of figures which will show that about one-half of the clerkal force of the post offices are employed at night; some of these not all night, but on tours that extend after S p. m. In the large cities there are many who report for duty at midnight and work until 9 a. m. The work of a distributor is performed standing up, and as his dispatch of letters and all matter must be absolutely accurate he is not only working under a physical but as well a severe mental strain.

The post-office clerk is a most skilled mechanic doing laborious work. When it is considered that about half of the clerks are deprived from participation of social life by reason of their being employed at night, and that in addition to the severe strain of working the unnatural hours of night they can not always get any rest or sleep during the day because of the noise and activity around them at home, and this is especially true of the clerks in cities like New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, and other large cities, where cost of living is such that the clerk's average salary of $80 a month will not permit bilm to live outside of the congested districts, he must get the cheapest kind of rent; when consideration is given to such facts, gentlemen, I can not see or understand that there is any argument that can be advanced by the department or anyone else in opposition to the post-offic

We contend that every clerk employed at night should be on a six-hour schedule. The medical profession and all others who have given study to the effect of night work agree that six hours' night work is equivalent to eight hours' day work. We believe that if you gentlemen will report the Reilly bill providing for an eight-hour day favorably and support it on the floor of the House and it becomes a law that we will be able in course of time to convince the department that much work is being done at night now that could be done just as well during the day, with a saving of light expense and with more efficiency. We believe that merchandise and unimportant circular matter, such as catalogues and the like, could well be left over to be distributed the next day and a larger force be employed on day work in lieu of night duty. Freight departments of all railroads will not receive any freight after 6 o'clock at night; there is no reason and no demand that clerks be employed at night to work on matter that is unimportant, such as that mentioned.

The department argues that an eight-hour day for post-office clerks is not practicable, yet it contends that it is working the clerks on a practical eight-hour schedule. The department cites as a reason for opposition to an eight-hour day that "there is a wide fluctuation in the amount of mail handled at various periods," It is true that there is an abnormal amount of mail handled at various periods, such as the holiday season and at times when large mail-order concerns flood the mails with catalogues and circulars, but these fluctations occur at regular seasons. During the holiday season there is always in every post office, as in every express company and business house, a rush of work. Overtime compensation is always paid by private concerns. The other fluctuations caused by circulars and catalogues can be very readily handled without the necessity of overtime pay by proper administration on the part of the supervisory force and by keeping in touch with the heavy mailers an prove exceedingly wasterii. Among the 00,000 clerks and carriers in the 2,351 first and second class offices there are many who would find in this opportunity to earn additional compensation such inducement to loiter and waste time that the additional cost of the service would be very large."

Dr. Grandfield by that statement reflects not only on the loyalty yes, the honesty, of the clerical and carrier force—for he who would deliberately steal time in order to earn additional compensation is dishonest—but he reflects on the ability of his own supervisory force. Certainly if a competent supervisory force is in charge they will as their first duty see to it that any clerk or carrier who is not competent and willing to do a fair day's work is not retained.

That statement in opposition to legislation as embodied in Congressman Reilly's bill demonstrates how futile are the efforts of the department to find a substantial argument with which to combat the clerks' reasonable request for an eight-hour day.

Admitting for argument's sake that the department could not find any other way out of it but pay for the overtime work when the mail fluctuates—certainly the department can not contend that these abnormal periods come very often, because if that was the case the department is admitting that we are working over eight hours a day now very often, and they deny that.

The sum and substance of the situation is that the department would rather that they have the authority to work us an unlimited amount of hours than employ the force necessary to efficient service or pay us for overtime. That we are not desfrous of working overtime is best evidenced by the fact we are not asking time and a half or double time for overtime work. We would rather have a law that would prohibit over eight hours' work a day, if such a law were constitutional or did not interfere with the interests of the service.

All that the post-office clerks request that you gentlemen of this committee and the other Members of Congress do before passing ju

As a side remark, I want to mention the fact that in the spring of 1910, before I was removed from the postal service, I was employed in the city delivery division of the Chicago office on the day set, and for the want of about 25 additional clerks in the city division, mail that was being transported into Chicago on fast-mail trains and at enormous expense to the Government and which should have been worked up and delivered on the first mail delivery in the loop district was not worked up until noontime for weeks and weeks in order to economize to the extent of the cost of about 25 additional clerks, the Government paying a bonus for fast special service by the railroads to get that mail into the city of Chicago at such an hour that it could be worked up and distributed and delivered to the business men on the first delivery.

It has been demonstrated time and time again that an employee working a reasonable number of hours each day under decent conditions can and does accomplish more within the eight hours and produces a better class of work than the worker who toils an unreasonable number of hours and has not sufficient time to recuperate and keep himself or herself in good physical condition.

I can say authoritatively that the enactment of such provisions as are contained in the Reilly bill, and which will grant us justice, an eight-hour day, will not increase the cost of clerical hire to any noteworthy extent. The trouble has been, and is now, the cause of the department's opposition—that they believe the working of the clerks long hours has effected economy, and they desire to continue to have the clerks as the source of economy. But in reality long hours has not been economical to the department; they have not on the whole gotten any more work from the clerks. Enact the Reilly bill and it will compel the department to get busy on a plan of schedules and arrangements that will permit of the clerks handling the mail within the eight hours. They have never had to do it, and therefore no great effort has been made along that line. It will cause the supervisory officials to see to it that they get in touch with the heavy mailers in their town or city and arrange to have the mail sent in as it is made ready for mailing, and then there will not be tons of circulars dumped in the office at one time and without notice or possibility to handle it efficiently and speedily. It will cause them to have a trained auxiliary force to meet any emergency that is not avoidable. The clerks under an eight-hour schedule will work with more vian and vigor and a greater degree of accuracy than they can possibly do now when they are required to work a long stretch of hours, because the supervisory force do not take the trouble to arrange avoidable conditions.

Gentlemen of the committee, I plead with you that you give this consideration with the thought in mind that you want to do justice to the clerks and the service. If you do, I am more than sure that you will report the Reilly bill out, with your recommendation that it do pass, at the same time that you report out the appropriation bill. Knowing the deadly effect of the "point of order" that permits one Member of Congress to assassinate legislation that is attached to appropriation bills, I plead with you to report it out as a separate measure.

The Chairman. Why separate bill? If we had a rule to make order would not that be sufficient?

Mr. Nelson If you could safeguard it against the point of order.

The Charrman. We might be able to do that if we conclude to do it at all.

Mr. Nelson. I trust you will conclude to do it and will be able to make that arrangement.

The letter carriers enjoyed an 8-hour law for years until a year or a little more ago, when Mr. Hitchcock succeeded in having the Court of Claims render a decision that a provision in an appropriation bill of some years ago providing "that carriers should not be worked more than 48 hours during the 6 working days of the week" was permanent law, and the department has since been working the carriers on that basis. On that basis much injustice has developed because of the leeway that it permits of working a carrier of hours to-day and 7 to-morrow. The fact that efficient service was rendered and no embarrassment to the service resulted when the carriers were under a straight 8-hour law is the best argument that can be advanced that the Rellly bill is not an untried proposition. Both the clerks and carriers are entitled to its just provisions.

I must, however, in justice to the clerks—and I believe that the carriers will understand, and I hope this committee will, that my pleading is for justice to both the clerks and carriers and that I make the statement clear that full justice will never be done on the hour question until such a measure as is the Rellly bill is enacted. But I desire to make this additional statement: That should this committee in some way become of doubtful mind as to the advisability of enacting the provisions of the Rellly bill—and I can not see how that can happen, but in the event that it does—I say to you on the department's own argument "that the regulation providing a 48-hour week for carriers is satisfactory to the service." that certainly the post-office clerks, with the scheme study and night work required of them, are beyond a question of doubt entitled to a regulation that will regard to providing for 1 full day's res rormer Congressman Goebel introduced in the Sixty-first Congress, providing for 48 hours a week of 6 days.

The bill referred to by Mr. Nelson follows:

"A bill to regulate the hours of labor of clerks in first and second class shall be required to work not to exceed 48 hours in any one week, except as hereinafter provided.

"Sec. 2. That all clerks designated in section 1 of this act shall be allowed one full day's rest in each week with full pay therefor.

"Sec. 3. That the hours of duty of each clerk shall be performed in 8 consecutive hours in each 24, or as near thereto as may be possible.

"Sec. 4. That when any clerk is required to work more than 48 hours in any one week, said clerk shall receive extra compensation for all time worked in excess of 48 hours at the regular rate of pay of said clerk: Provided, That in no case shall pay for overtime be at a rate less than 30 cents per hour."

It was said for years that the post offices could not be closed on Sundays, and that compensatory time off for Sunday work could not be given. That was said before the department really tried to work out a schedule to grant such time. To-day—thanks to the provision that was carried in the last appropriation bill which served to awaken some postmasters to try to arrange for compensatory time off for Sunday work—it has been done in many offices; but in view of the fact that the provision was not mandatory in its provisions there are some postmasters who have refused to try to comply with your suggestion made last session.

Congressman Reilly's bill provides that it shall be mandatory to grant compensatory time off for Sunday work. It is only by mandatory provisions that Congress can hope to have its will carried out when so many are to be relied upon to interpret the same. I desire to call your attention to this fact relative to compensatory time off for Sunday work. That in effect, even with its provision obeyed, it does not give to the clerk one full day of rest per week. In most all instances the Sunday work performed order clerks to report for duty for two hours on Sunday when at times that could be avoided. That is done because they can afford to grant two hours off without much inconvenience during the week. As a clerk must spend time in coming and going from work to put in two hours, it is preferable almost to work a full day on Sunday and have a full day off during the week. By providing for one full day off during the week you would check unnecessary Sunday work, and the clerk could get the benefit of one complete day's rest.

I have devoted considerable time to a portrayal of the emphatic need of legislation to regulate the hours of labor of post-office clerks. I believe that I have pointed out the character of the work they do, its demands on them mentally and physically, and the conditions under which it is performed. I have wanted to do this accurately and thoroughly, so that you might be duly impressed with the need for action in response to our very just request. I hope that I have accomplished my purpose. This need is paramount to all our needs for legislation, with the exception of that embraced in the measure known as the Lloyd bill, providing for the restoration of our rights as American citizens.

There are no supposed to the contract of the paramount of the measure known as the Lloyd bill, providing for the restoration of our rights as American citizens.

THIRTY DAYS' VACATION.

for legislation, with the exception of that embraced in the measure known as the Lloyd bill, providing for the restoration of our rights as American citizens.

THIRTY DAYS' VACATION.

The organization I represent have gone on record as being opposed to the legislation recommended by the Postmaster General to provide him with the authority to give us 30 days' vacation. The form of a bill for 30 days' vacation that he advocates and has been pushing leaves it optional with him as to the number of days' vacation that should be allowed; it would repeal the present mandatory 15-day vacation act and he might then decree to grant us only 5 or 10 days' vacation. That is one reason for our failure to indorse his movement and recommendation for 30 days' vacation.

In this connection permit me to also call your attention to the fact that the Postmaster General, evidently in an effort to forestall the enactment of legislation to regulate our hours of labor, has established in some post offices a rebate system for the rebating of all time worked in excess of eight hours a day averaged for the year; that is to say, that in some offices the time worked for the year; that is to say, that in some offices the time worked for the year is aggregated, and whatever time in excess of the time that eight hours a day multiplied by the number of working days in the year amounts to is rebated by granting the time off at convenient periods during the following year. I want to say very frankly that the clerks appreciator receiving such a rebate rather than none at all. But I do want to call attention to the fact that working us 10 hours a night for two or three months straight and thereby shattering and undermining on health can not be compensated for by allowing us time off the following year. Such a system is far from being as economical as the Postmaster General believes it is. During the time that the clerks are working the 10-hour a day or night stretch they are accomplishing not one whit more than if they came down to work each day kn

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Nelson is one of the most intelligent men active in the trade-union movement, and his honesty and sincerity of purpose and fidelity to a principle were well proven when his steadfastness to the cause of the postal clerks caused him to give up his position in the Chicago post office. Mr. Nelson, as president of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, has studied this question from the viewpoint of the best interests of the postal employees and postal service, and is well qualified to know the needs of adopting legislation which is incorporated in this Post Office appropriation bill for the purpose of improving the conditions of the postal employees

Mr. Chairman, there are several legislative features in this pending Post Office appropriation bill of great moment to the vast army of postal employees of this country. The provision contained in this bill to establish an eight-hour day for postoffice clerks and city letter carriers is of such obvious merit that it is difficult to understand why such legislation has not been enacted long ago. Another provision in this bill, that which restores to the postal employees of the country their citizenship with its right of free speech guaranteed to them by the Constitution is second to no other feature of this bill in ifs far-reaching importance.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to present a statement of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks, in which the adoption of both these provisions is earnestly advocated:

The United National Association of Post Office Clerks is an organization of more than 22,000 members, composed of the clerks employed in the first and second class post offices of the country. Year after year in its annual conventions it has gone on record asking for the establishment of an eight-hour day. For more than 15 years it has inspired the introduction of bills to establish an eight-hour day, but all of these bills year after year have been permitted to slumber in the pigeonhole of the Post Office Committee.

The Post Office Department has chosen in all of these years to strongly oppose the enactment of legislation looking to the establishment of an eight-hour day for post-office clerks. Post Office Department, in different reports, has contended that the clerks did not actually average more than eight hours a day. The department has also professed its belief that eight hours was sufficient to constitute a day's labor. Notwithstanding all of these protestations the hours of the clerks have been so long and the working conditions under which they have labored have been so burdensome as to make conditions well nigh intolerable. For three years the United National Association of Post Office Clerks has declared at each annual convention that the establishment of a legal eight-hour day for post-office clerks was their greatest need and their paramount issue. While other conditions in the service need legislative correction, this organization has been compelled to recognize that no other issue even approximated the importance of the enactment of an eight-hour bill. Ever since 1868 it has been the policy of this Government to require not more than eight hours of labor each day from its employees. There has never existed any reason why this army of post-office clerks should have been denied the benefits of that recognized policy of the Government. On June 30, 1911, there were 32,319 clerks employed in the 2,351 first and second class post offices of the Uhited States. It is perfectly obvious that the hours of labor of such a vast army of employees can only be safely regulated by legislation. To permit each one of the 2,351 postmasters of the country to use his own discretion as to what constitutes a day's labor could only invite the chaos, discrimination, and favoritism which has prevailed. Statistics gathered by the United National Association of Post Office Clerks for the month of October, 1911, reveals the fact that the clerks in 230 first and second class post offices in almost every State in the Union have actually been employed from 9 hours to 12 hours a day exclusive of all time off for meals, and so forth. It must be remembered that these clerks are very frequently employed in poorly ventilated and insanitary buildings not suited to post-office work. A very large percentage are employed at night working under artificial light. A large percentage are distributors upon whom depend the prompt and expeditious dispatch of the mails.

These distributors to be proficient must devote hours of study at home in the mastering of difficult schemes of distribution. These clerks must memorize the names of post offices in many States; they must know the railroads by which the mails can be dispatched; they must know at what particular hour of the day or night to dispatch a letter by the proper road, for there are many roads with trains departing at different hours of the day or night. These men have little or no opportunity to be seated while at their work, and they are constantly exercising both body and brain. The department in opposing this legisla-tion contends that it might be impractical, because the mails do not flow evenly at all seasons of the year. The best answer to this argument is to say that there is no business of any character in this country in which there is not a change in the volume of the same at different seasons. As a matter of fact, a study of the postal receipts, which constitute the best criterion as to the volume of mails, shows remarkable uniformity in the volume of mail. For eight months of the year—September, October, November, January, February, April, May, and June—the average monthly receipts for the 50 largest offices of the country is $9,597,815.88. The receipts for November, the heaviest month of these eight, were $9,956,475.20. Thus it will be seen that for eight months of the year there is remarkable uniformity in the volume of the mall. In July and August, the midsummer months, the receipts are materially less, but there is no relaxation for the clerks, for during these two months these 32,319 clerks take their annual vacations, allowed by law, The clerks remaining on duty must discharge in of 15 days. addition to their own duties the duties of the clerks who are on vacation. As a result in very many offices the clerks actually work in excess of eight hours a day, even in these midsummer months. In December and March the volume of mail is very much greater than the volume during the normal eight months of the year. However, through legislation enacted in 1907, the department has the right to employ auxiliary help at the rate of 30 cents an hour, and if proper advantage of this existing legislation is taken, all of these emergencies can be met.

This proposed S-hour legislation in this bill provides that the clerks and letter carriers shall work S hours within 10, and that if the needs of the service require they can be requested to work in excess of S hours, provided that they be paid extra for the same in proportion to their salaries as fixed by law. These employees, in seeking legislation specifically stating that the proposed S hours may be stretched over a period of 10 hours, show a very reasonable attitude. Naturally the clerks and carriers would prefer to work 8 hours within 9 hours, but to give the service every possible advantage they have yielded this point and have asked that the 8 hours shall be covered within a period of 10 hours. Under existing conditions where 8-hour schedules are supposed to obtain, the 8 hours are frequently stretched out over a period of 12 or more liours. This is a condition that the United National Association of Post Office Clerks has long tried to bring to the attention of Congress. A system has grown up in the postal service whereby clerks and carriers are compelled to register off duty for periods of one hour or more at different times of the day. This time off duty is of no advantage whatever to the employee, and he would much prefer to be steadily employed. In opposing this legislation the department has contended that that clause which provides that the employees shall be paid extra for time worked in excess of 8 hours each day would provide an opportunity for these employees to purposely extend their time beyond 8 hours to increase their compensation. Such a charge should be unworthy of a great department of the Government. The lack of confidence which such a charge indicates in the rank and file of the employees can not be justified. The clerks and carriers are as loyal to the service as are their superiors. Their only purpose is to secure an 8-hour day. By asking for the insertion of this clause-that the 8 hours may extend over 10 hours-they showed a disposition to meet the emergencies of

It must not be overlooked that any proposed 8-hour legislation which does not provide for pay for overtime would not be mandatory. The courts have frequently held that legislation regulating the hours of the employees, which did not provide a penalty in the event that the men were permitted to work more than eight hours, was merely directory and not mandatory.

As a matter of fact, if this proposed S-hour legislation is enacted, it will simply mean that the supervisory officers of the Post Office Department, who are paid to supervise the work of the employees, will have to readjust the schedules of the employees so that their duties can be performed each day in 8 hours within a period of 10 hours. The department contends that it will prove very expensive to pay these employees for their overtime. Certainly this contention can not be given serious consideration in opposing this legislation. Even if it were true that there would be an increased cost to the Government, can anyone justify the withholding from these employees the just compensation which they have earned? The First Assistant Postmaster General, in a statement before the Post Office Committee in the hearings on this pending bill, stated—about 85 per cent of the carriers and clerks complete their tour of duty within 10 hours, and probably 95 per cent within 11 hours, but in some instances their 8-hour tours of duty extend over 12 or 13 hours, I presume.

This official statement of the First Assistant Postmaster General shows conclusively that there will be no considerable increase in the cost of this service, and it is hard to understand the attitude of the department in opposition to this legislation after such a statement as above quoted has been made. A clause in this bill provides as follows:

That should the needs of the service require the employment on Sunday of letter carriers in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices, the employees who are required and ordered to perform Sunday work shall be allowed compensatory time off on one of the six days following the Sunday on which they performed such service.

For years and years it has been customary to open the post offices of the country on Sunday. This practice necessitated that many clerks and carriers had to be on duty on Sundays as well as any other day. For this Sunday work they received no consideration whatsoever. The last Congress incorporated a provision in the appropriation bill to the effect that for services required on Sundays these employees "may" be allowed compensatory time off on a week day for the time worked on Sunday. Because of the use of the word "may" the department construed this legislation to be permissive rather than directory, with the result that there are upward of 300 offices of the first and second class now where the clerks are not receiving compensatory time off for their Sunday work.

In a great many other offices where the compensatory time is given it is doled out to the employees in installments of 10 or 15 minutes a day. Of course this time so distributed is of no use to the employee. The clause in this pending legislation makes it mandatory to give the employees time off for all necessary Sunday work, and it further provides that they shall have this time off for this Sunday work on some one day.

AS TO LETTER CARRIERS.

On May 24, 1888, Congress enacted what was known as the letter carriers' eight-hour law. Notwithstanding the enactment of that law, no genuine effort was made by the post-office officials to put the same into effect until after a decision of the Supreme Court on a suit to recover pay for overtime. As a result of that suit the Government was called upon to pay approximately $3,000,000 on claims of letter carriers who had worked in excess of eight hours. On January 1, 1895, following the decision of the Supreme Court, Postmaster General Bissell issued an order to prevent the further making of overtime by letter carriers. From that time on the department exercised such supervision over the schedules of the letter carriers that no overtime was ever permitted and in all of these subsequent years the public received a satisfactory service. The letter carriers continued to enjoy the benefits of their eight-hour law until June 30, 1900. When the Post Office appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1901, was under consideration, Mr. Loud, chairman of the committee at that time, offered an amendment from the floor, which reads as follows:

Provided, That letter carriers may be required to work as nearly as practicable only 8 hours on each working day, but not in any event exceeding 48 hours during the 6 working days of each week, and such number of hours on Sunday not exceeding 8, as may be required by the needs of the service; and if a legal holiday shall occur on any working day, the service performed on such day, if less than 8 hours, shall be counted as 8 hours without regard to the time actually employed.

This 48-hour law for letter carriers did not give satisfaction either to the officials of the department or to the letter carriers. In 1901 the department called upon the Assistant Attorney General for the department for an opinion as to the life of this 48-hour provision above quoted. The legal opinion rendered was to the effect that the proviso in the appropriation act above quoted ended with the year for which the appropriation was made. The following year the letter carriers were again placed back under the provisions of their regular 8-hour law. This was in 1901. In 1909 the Postmaster General instigated a suit in the Court of Claims to determine whether the 48-hour proviso in the appropriation act of 1901 superseded the letter carriers' 8-hour law of 1888. Finally, on May 31, 1910, the Court of Claims handed down a decision that the 48-hour proviso in the appropriation act of 1901 was in full force and effect. Following that decision the Post Office Department issued orders that the carriers should be placed back on the basis of 48 hours per week rather than 8 hours per day. The 48-hour per week proviso contained no penalty clause giving the carrier the right to recover in the event that he was compelled to work more than 48 hours per week. There has been much dissatisfaction since the carriers have been placed back on the 48-hour per week basis. The temptation exists, and has been taken advantage of, to drop a trip on one day and add on an extra trip some other day. Naturally this taking advantage of every possible moment of the carrier's time militates against the regularity of delivering mail and leads to dissatisfaction and complaints among the business people. The fact that the carriers were not permitted to work overtime from 1895 to 1901 is the most conclusive evidence that schedules can be so arranged as to provide for 8 hours' work without overtime. While the post-office clerks have never been protected by any legislation whatever as to their hours of labor, it will be observed that the carriers did have some protection. But since this recent decision of the Court of Claims, under which it has been declared that the carriers' 8-hour law of 1888 is nullified, the letter carriers are also practically without legal protection as to their hours of labor. Consequently it has become a paramount issue of the letter carriers to reestablish their 8-hour day. National Association of Letter Carriers, composed of some 30,000 letter carriers in the first and second class post offices of the country, have made common cause with the United National Association of Post Office Clerks in seeking a genuine 8-hour day law. These two organizations are in thorough agreement as to the provisions of this pending 8-hour legislation which the Post Office Committee has incorporated in the Post Office appropriation bill.

THE GAG RULE.

The Post Office Committee has incorporated in this appropriation bill the bill which was introduced by Mr. Leave of Missouri, to free the civil-service employees of the Government from the operation of the so-called gag rule, first promulgated by former President Roosevelt and afterwards reissued by the present Chief Executive of the Nation. Under this rule the employees were prevented from appealing to either House of Congress or to any committee of Congress or to any Member of Congress for legislation to remedy their working conditions. No rule was ever issued which has been more obnoxious and more galling to the employees of the Government. To say that because men take employment in the Government service they must sacrifice their citizenship and their right of free speech is an absurdity which would be humorous were it not for the seriousness of its effects. The purpose of the gag rule was to prevent the Congress from learning the actual conditions that surrounded the employees of the service. Under its operation the committees of Congress could hear but one side of the story as to how the employees were treated. That conditions in the postal service have been so bad has been largely due to the fact that the employees were intimidated through the existence of this gag order from effectively making known to Congress the real conditions that prevail. The Lloyd bill also provides that no employee shall be removed from the civil service without being furnished with a written copy of the charges preferred against him and an opportunity to submit a defense in writing and to submit affidavits in support of his defense. It is further provided that a full and complete record of each case shall be annually reported to Congress. The effect of this legislation will be to give the employees a degree of self-confidence which they can not feel at present. The officials of the postal service will be very slow to prefer charges against an employee because of an ambition to satisfy a personal feeling or because an employee might hold to different political belief. this order will be to give associations of postal employees the right to appeal directly to the different committees of Congress and will result in all of the facts being made known. sonnel of the postal service is of a very high order. The rank and file can be depended upon not to take advantage of this liberty which was theirs and is now being restored to them through the sense of justice which animated the Post Office Committee in putting this legislation in the appropriation bill. At the last annual convention of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks the first resolution acted upon by that body was a resolution indorsing the Lloyd bill and praying Congress for its speedy enactment. That resolution was carried unanimously and with enthusiasm. The employees affected by this legislation will entertain the strongest sense of gratitude to the Congress that enacts into legislation these two provisions-the eight-hour law and the antigag law.

In adopting this eight-hour provision we will give the postal employees protection which has been denied them by the Republican administration for lo, these many years. It will prove my claim that the Government employees can only secure redress by the overthrow of the present administration and the misrule of the Republican Party, and put the reigns of the Government in the control of the Democratic Party, under the leadership of a true Democrat, the Speaker of this House, a man who never turns a deaf ear to the appeals of the workingmen. In adopting the eight-hour provision and throwing greater safeguards around the life and limb of the postal employees this Democratic House is responding to the appeals of the postal employees, which have been received by the Republican Party when in full control of Congress with deaf cars. In passing, with our approval, this provision the Democrats are fulfilling their campaign pledge made to the workingmen of the country, just as we have fulfilled other promises by the passage of the bill providing for the extension of the eight-hour law for Government contract work, the prison-labor bill, the bill providing for a children's bureau in the Department of Commerce and Labor; also by the passage of bills reducing the tariff on the necessaries of life which, if approved of by the Republican Senate and the President, will result in a material reduction in the high cost of living.

The Democratic Party holds that a campaign promise is a solemn pledge to be faithfully discharged when it has been intrusted with power, but consider this in contrast with the Republican Party, whose every action indicates that it makes promises to give the people remedial legislation solely for campaign purposes and to be violated when once intrusted with power. The great Democratic Party, by virtue of this pledge and performance, makes itself the great agency through which the expressed will of the people may be secured, while on the other hand the Republican Party becomes the implied, if not the expressed, agent of plutograps.

the expressed, agent of plutocracy.

When the Speaker of this House is President of these United States [applause] and the Democratic Party in full control of our National Government, then indeed can the workers, both in public and private employment, rejoice, for then they will be able to secure redress from the many evils and burdens flowing from the many years of Republican misrule. The Government will again be wrenched from the control of plutocracy, secured in the hands of democracy, and equality and justice will reign supreme.

It has been said on the floor of this House that our Government employees have not the courage to exercise their influence in politics to free themselves from the hardships that they suffer. I deny this charge. It is not true. They have been deceived for years by the false promises of the leaders of the Republican Party, but they are now fully awake to the deception that the party of plutocracy has practiced upon them and the working people of our country, and when the votes are counted in the next November election it will be found that the workers have both the intelligence and courage to throw off the yoke of oppression that has been placed upon their shoulders by greed and avarice. While oppression in many instances has been their lot, deception practiced upon them, and promises made apparently in good faith and so accepted have been unfulfilled, yet with all this their spirit remains unbroken; and since they have come to the full realization that it is impossible for them to get redress from the party of wealth and power, the party of plutocracy-the Republican Party-they will unite their forces with the enlightened freemen of America to elevate to the highest office in the gift of the people of this Nation the man who believes and puts into practice that "a public office is a public trust and a public official is a public servant,' that this Government of this great American country should be made a Government of the people in fact by operating it for the benefit of the whole people instead of for the benefit of a privileged few-the man who believes that equal rights for all and special privileges for none is more than a mere glittering generally, but should be made an actual condition of human So they are turning to the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, whose rugged honesty, sincerity of purpose, and fidelity to a principle will justify their confidence and support. [Applause.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

[Mr. GILLETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKenzie] such part of 30 minutes as he may wish.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is certainly embarrassing to attempt to address you at this late hour, but it seems to be my opportunity in the discussion, and I want to make a few observations on the bill under consideration. In the first place, I want to congratulate the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and the members of that committee for the many good recommendations in the bill now before us. plause.]

It contains many things that appeal to me, and which ought to appeal to every Member of this House. The provision re-quiring that in the near future all mail cars shall be constructed of steel or other indestructible material is a wise and humane provision, and it ought to have been legislated into the law of the land long ago, for it means better protection for the lives of the railway mail clerks in their most hazardous occupation. Again, the provision shortening the hours of labor and granting higher compensation to the clerks and employees in the postal service meets with my hearty approval. I have always felt that the wage earner, whether employed by an individual, a corporation, or the Government, should receive such a reasonable wage as would enable him to live in ordinary comfort, clothe his family respectably, educate his children, and by the exercise of reasonable economy and frugality, lay aside a sufficient sum to purchase a home in which to dwell in the declining years of his life; in other words, in the closing years of life, when no longer able to perform manual labor, he could have a home to dwell in and not be driven from place to place and perhaps ultimately become a public charge.

I am in favor of the Government regulating the great publicservice corporations of the country, and in such regulation of the rates charged by such corporations to permit the charging of such rates as will enable the corporation, after paying all other necessary charges and expenses, to pay such a wage as I have mentioned.

I wish to briefly refer to that provision of the bill that breaks the fetters that have heretofore bound the men in the postal service in such a way that they dare not bring their grievances to the notice of the department, except in such manner as provided by their superior officer; dare not solicit the aid of their best friend, should he happen to be a Member of Congress, in order to have him intercede in his behalf. I am glad that such restriction is to be removed and that hereafter we will recognize in this country that when a man enters the Government service he does not surrender any of his rights or liberties as an American citizen. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman if any other rule ever prevailed until the last two years?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not know. I will simply say that I want to see the regulation abolished.

Mr. BARTLETT. I agree with you. Mr. McKENZIE. To the end that no autocratic superior holding an official position in the Government may enforce any such rule against an inferior.

Mr. BARTLETT. I agree with the gentleman; but it was never until the last two years that such an autocratic rule was attempted to be enforced.

Mr. McKENZIE. I believe in the maintenance of discipline in the Government service, and I would dismiss a disturber without ceremony. But such a rule as has been in force is, in my judgment, unfair and un-American.

As to the provision relating to a parcel-post system, I am not so sure that the committee has met the expectations of the people. However, it is a great problem, and one surrounded by many apparent difficulties, and it may be that the recommendation of the committee to simply experiment on a small scale at first, until experience demonstrates the wisdom of enlarging the scope of the law, as was done in the rural-route service; may be the wise course. At any rate, it is not my purpose to discuss that particular portion of the bill, well knowing that there are many men here who will discuss it and who are prepared with facts and figures that will tend to give us more light on the subject. I therefore feel that anything I might say would not be of any advantage to the members of the committee.

My main purpose in addressing the committee was to say a few words in regard to the proposition, made a part of the bill under special rule, relating to Government aid in maintaining post roads in this country.

It has been said on the floor of this House in opposition to this measure that it is unconstitutional, and, further, that it will be the commencement of a raid on the Treasury that will in the end bankrupt the Nation, and, strangely enough, much of this opposition comes from men who have been Members of the House for many years and have witnessed raid after raid made upon the Treasury that would make this raid look very small by comparison,

Mr. AKIN of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes, sir; for a question. Mr. AKIN of New York. Do you know of there being any thought of a commission by anybody to examine into the matter of the appropriation of $75,000 for the post-office building out at Sundance, where they have 201 inhabitants, in the State of Wyoming?

Mr. McKENZIE. I have heard about that. I have no objections to the people of Sundance getting a public building along with the other cities of the country.

Mr. AKIN of New York. You do not know about a commission being appointed to ascertain whether they should have a building or not?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not know anything about that.

Now, I want to say in all frankness that this proposition is a new departure in legislation. It is something new for the House of Representatives to be considering the advisability of using Government money in the maintenance of public roads in this country under the name of post roads, and it may be that no man can foresee the extent to which this will be carried if once entered upon by Congress.

However, my friends, when I stop to think that in the years that have passed Congress has appropriated over $800,000,000 for the improvement of the inland waterways of this country, I am not unmindful of the fact that during all that time the transportation or navigation of the navigable waterways of the country has been growing less and less as the years went by. So far as I am individually concerned, I do not seriously object to these appropriations when it can be shown that they will result in some practical benefit to the people. I am in favor of improving and maintaining good harbor facilities at our lake and deep-water shipping points where some practical use can be made of them, but I am unalterably opposed to appro-priating the public money for the purpose of so-called development of inland waterways which, even if made navigable, would be of no earthly use or advantage to the people.

The money to pay for all these projects has been collected from all the people, and will continue so to be, and the end is not yet.

There are some astounding proposals now pending and being agitated; for example, what is known as the Newlands plan, which contemplates the expenditure of $50,000,000 a year for 10 years for the purpose of standardizing the rivers, irrigation of arid land, reforestation, the building of reservoirs, and many other projects. But in order that I may not be misunderstood or in any way misrepresent the facts I submit the following, taken from an article written by Philip R. Kellar and published in the April (1912) number of the Waterways and Commerce Journal, in which he uses the following language:

The bill appropriates $50,000,000 a year for 10 years for the "river-regulation fund," to be used "for the regulation of interstate commerce and in aid thereof, for examinations and surveys, and for the construction of engineering and other works and projects for the regulation and control of the flow of navigable rivers and their tributaries and source streams, and for the standardization of such flow, and for flood prevention and protection, by the establishment, construction, and maintenance of natural and artificial reservoirs, and by the protection of watersheds from denudation and erosion and from forest fires, and by the maintenance and extension of woodland and other protective cover thereon, and by the reclamation of swamp and overflow lands, and by the building of drainage and irrigation works, and by doing all things necessary to provide for any and all beneficial uses of water that will contribute to its conservation or storage in the ground or in surface reservoirs as an aid to the regulation or control of the flow of rivers * *; the purpose of this act being river regulation and the control of the volume of water forming the stage of the river from its sources, so as to standardize the river flow, as contradistinguished from and supplemental to channel improvement as heretofore undertaken and provided for under the various acts commonly known as the river and harbor acts."

rhere are more than 75,000,000 acres of swamp and overflow lands scattered through 36 States and Territories. These lands are worthless, in addition to being disease-breeding spots that affect the public health. Reclaimed they would produce at the very lowest $30 worth per acre every year, or $2,250,000,000. There are between 50,000,000 and 100,000,000 acres partially subject to overflow. Their productiveness would be increased by at least $10 per acre, or $500,000,000 per year at the lowest figures. There are 35,000,000 acres of arid and semiarid land which could be irrigated if the water in the tributaries of the navigable rivers was stored at flood time and distributed during seasons of drought. These would produce at least $30 an acre, or $1,050,000,000. The annual loss from forest fires, soil erosion, etc., is approximately $200,000,000. This makes the grand total of $4,000,000,000 that would be saved annually if the Newlands bill is passed and its provisions carried into effect. And this does not take into account the benefit to the public health, the increased transportation facilities due to better river navigation, and the added manufacturing industries that such a vast increase in agricultural productiveness would support.

Apparently a simple proposition; and the returns to come from the investment—just think of it. Invest $50,000,000 a year for 10 years; total investment, $500,000,000. Note the conservative estimate of the return or saving—$4,000,000,000 annually. Did ever an oil-well or mining-stock promoter have such an inviting prospectus? What a beautiful and colossal dream. The scheme contemplates the irrigation of the arid regions of the West and the draining of the swamps in the South, and to these two projects I have no particular objection. I am not opposed to the construction of reservoirs in our western country in order to reclaim a part of that barren waste, where it is feasible; but when we think of some of the projects that have been put over we should stop and consider well be-Take the project known as the Hondo project, fore acting. for example. If a constituent of mine writes me the truth, and I have no reason to doubt him, after the appropriation had been made by Congress to construct the reservoir at this place the land sharks immediately began to sell the land which was assumed would be watered from the reservoir. This constituent of mine, acting on the inducements offered him, purchased some of this land, and now it turns out that after the reservoir is constructed there is no water for him; that the water is lost by seepage, and, I presume, the wind carried considerable sand into the reservoir, and that had a tendency to absorb the water. At any rate, the Government built the reservoir, my friend bought the land, the reservoir is dry, nothing grows on the land, and my friend holds the sack; and he is inclined to complain, I think, justly.

It is against such things as this I protest. We all know that recently Congress-not this Congress, however-enacted a law to appropriate money for the taking over certain so-called forest reserves, among them the Appalachian Mountain Reserve, for the purpose of reforestation, for one alleged purpose of regulating the watercourses. Aye, and men were hired to plant the trees, and then to watch them grow, to watch the leaves fall and watch that no one burned the leaves, in order that when the rain descended the leaves would hold the rain and the rain would percolate slowly, not swiftly, through the leaves and form rivulets, and the rivulets would slowly meander down the mountain side into the valley below and there be caught in a great reservoir, built for the purpose, in order that the water could be held in reserve and let out at intervals as navigation demanded. That proposition was approved by Congress, and there are many men in this country to-day advocating just such propositions.

Now, while it may be the correct theory of conservation to do some of these impractical things, I must say to you, gentlemen, that, in the name of fairness, in the name of common justice and equity-and we hear a great deal about equity here-do you expect the people of Illinois and the other great States that are paying the greater part of the taxes necessary to carry out all these projects to submit quietly to such uses of the public money and make no complaint? If the discussion of the proposition to expend a part of the public money on the highways of the country arouses such hostility that will prevent such use and at the same time close the doors of the Treasury against all manner of raids that have been made in the past, this discussion will not have been in vain.

But, gentlemen, if you are going to continue to construct reservoirs in the shadow of the Rocky Mountains, where there is not sufficient water to fill them when built; if you are going to continue such schemes as planting trees on the barren slopes of the Appalachians simply because some scientist, engineer, or promoter advocates it, in the name of the taxpayers of Illinois, I shall most earnestly protest, but if it must be, then I shall insist that some portion of the public money shall be expended upon the highways of the country. [Applause.]

The construction and maintenance of the public roads in this country is the greatest economic question of the day, in my judgment. By improving the country roads the country is enriched; something has been done that will be of lasting value to the people of this and the coming generations, but if you should pour all the money of the Pizarros into the streams of the land whose channels are ever changing by the shifting sands that compose their beds, it would be but a ruthless waste, in my humble judgment. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mondell].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKenzie] illustrate how far-reaching is the effect of an error. Because we have deepened streams that should have been macadamized, because we have dredged lonesome harbors that never saw a boat, because we are proposing, in the interest of water-power owners and landowners, to embark upon an unfortunate scheme of centralization in the Appalachians and White Mountains, the gentleman from Illinois says, having done all these things that we ought not to have done, let there be no limit to our wrongdoing. what his argument amounts to.

The gentleman referred to the expenditure of a few Federal dollars in the West, but I want to remind him of the fact that the hardy sons of toil who are going on those lands are paying for them. The Government is not giving them anything except Not a dollar of Federal money goes to them as an opportunity. a gift. We simply lend them the Federal credit. Furthermore, we are not spending money raised by taxation, but the proceeds of the sales of our public lands for that work.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield gladly. Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman from Wyoming does not assume for a moment that I objected to the giving of the money to the western country?

Mr. MONDELL. No; not at all. Of course, the gentleman made the mistake of assuming that the plan of reclamation in the West could be properly compared with the Appalachian scheme or with the improper use of Federal money in river and harbor work. But the gentleman suggested that inasmuch as we had done things that, perhaps, we ought not to have done, in-stead of praying to be delivered from further mistakes we should go forward embracing every error that came along. At least that is what I understood the logic of the gentleman's argument

Mr. MADDEN. I congratulate my colleague on having drawn out this effusion from the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Wyoming will yield, I assume from what the gentleman says that he thinks the appropriations that have been made in the past are all right.

Not at all. I never did believe in the Mr. MONDELL. Appalachian fraud. I do not believe in it now. I never did believe we ought to have made many of the appropriations that we have made for rivers and harbors, and I do not think that the making of an appropriation in the past that should not have been made is a justification for doing what we ought not to do now or in the future. Rather, it is a warning to us to save the people's money and not expend it improperly and uselessly,

There are other questions besides the spending of public money involved in these schemes. After all, there are some things that are very much more important than the expenditure of money. Among these are great questions, involved in some of these matters, that go to the very foundation of our Government; affect its character; relate to the division of powers and jurisdiction; more important than the cash outlay are the questions as to the effect that the inauguration of certain policies will have upon the life of the Nation in years to come.

I did not vote for the special rule. In the years that I have been here I do not recall that I have ever voted for any rule that proposed to give an opportunity to place general legislation, involving new and important policies, on an appropriation bill. I can think of no worse practice in legislation than that of attempting to place general legislation of such a character on appropriation bills.

And it is as futile as it is evil, because we all understand the rule that the other body has the right to reject, and to insist in its rejection, of any general legislation placed on an appropriation bill.

And so if the Senate should object to any general legislation that may go on this bill by reason of this rule that legislation must come off or the House take the responsibility of the failure of the postal appropriation bill. The rule provides for the consideration of a number of matters that no one in the House would have objected to, but it also contains at least two features entirely new and revolutionary, propositions that have never been thoroughly considered by any committee of the House, that have never been considered to any considerable extent by the people of the country.

The special rule which the House has adopted places before us for consideration and action at least two measures involving a radical and revolutionary departure from our past policy and inaugurating movements the ultimate cost of which nobody professes to know, the ultimate effect of which on our national life no man can foresee.

Neither of these measures have received adequate consideration by committees of the House and neither of them has been generally considered by the people of the country to an extent that will warrant anyone in claiming that a definite public opinion has been formed concerning them.

CONDEMNATION AND APPROPRIATION OF EXPRESS COMPANIES.

The first of these propositions contemplates the condemnation appropriation and taking over by the United States of all the property of whatsoever kind of all the express companies of the country, including their "rights, privileges, and franchises," ostensibly "to promote the postal service" and "more efficiently regulate commerce."

I find it somewhat difficult to satisfactorily fathom the object of the Democratic majority in bringing this measure before the House in advance of any general demand for such action by the people of the country. Whatever may happen to the measure here, I assume that no one expects that it will become a law. I think I am justified in suggesting, therefore, that it is simply a part of a general program which it is fondly hoped will not be politically disadvantageous.

I shall leave to the lawyers of this body the task of discussing the many profound and far-reaching legal problems involved in this proposal. For the sake of argument only I shall assume that the condemnation and appropriation proposed can be legally accomplished, and shall confine myself to a brief discussion of some of the practical questions involved.

At the outset I am willing to confess some prejudice against the corporations, at least those best known, which have been carrying on the express business of the country. I can think of no extensive service which has been performed in a more generally unsatisfactory manner. Rates have been in the main excessively high, and the service in other respects has been far from uniformly satisfactory. Taking over a business which is properly a function of the railroads, the express companies have preyed upon the necessities of the public to create enormous dividends out of a business involving comparatively small initial expenditure. Assuming no risks, blazing no new trails, establishing no new highways of trade, the express companies have simply taken advantage of the facilities afforded by the railways to secure inordinate profits for a few privileged stockholders out of a service which should have remained in the hands of the railways to be furnished on the basis of fair and reasonable returns.

The day of inordinate express profits is drawing to a close. Express companies have been brought under control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the commission has been giving careful study to the express business in all its phases and with regard to all its details. In the near future the commission will promulgate an order profoundly affecting the methods of express business, rendering impossible double charges, providing for a reclassification, and materially reducing rates over the entire country. A few days ago there was reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a bill the effect of which, if enacted into law, will be to very considerably reduce the express rates on packages up to 11 pounds and provide connection between the express systems and rural routes. All this makes it very clear that the express business of the country must hereafter be conducted under close governmental supervision and at rates that will not afford the enormous profits of the past.

It strikes me as being very remarkable, to say the least, that just at this juncture, when, through an administrative bureau in full operation and legislation proposed, the rights and franchises and possibly the tangible property of the express com-panies are likely to be reduced tremendously in their earning capacity, that, without any proper consideration of the matter, it is precipitately proposed that the Government shall take over the companies, bag and baggage, including all of their accumulated junk.

I assume that it is admitted by all that the "property, rights, and franchises" proposed to be condemned and appropriated must be paid for. I also assume that it will not be denied that this property, these rights and franchises, must be paid for at least at their earning value at the time they are taken over-

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MONDELL. I shall be glad to.

Mr. LEWIS. There are no such things as express-company franchises, and the bill does not provide for the appropriation of money for express-company franchises.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not pretend to pass upon the question as to whether express companies have franchises. which the gentleman has supported and the legislation now before us certainly does provide in express terms for the condemnation and appropriation of the rights and franchises, as well as the property of express companies. I still hold to the idea that the constitutional prohibition against taking property without paying for it holds good, and whatever we may write into the law the courts will ultimately give these people what their property is worth, based on its earning value, and that is what you are proposing to do.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland, I think it ought to be said to the committee that the tabulation which the gentleman has presented for the consideration of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has been considering this matter, has had down an item of franchises and other things associated with it at a value of something like $10,000,000. It is only since the bill was considered that that item has dropped out, and if you will look at the special rule returned by the Committee on Rules now before the House making these things admissible on the present bill, you will find the word "franchise" in it. It was put into the bill by the gentleman and his associates in the formation of the Goeke bill.

Mr. LEWIS. It is not in the bill reported from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of which the gentleman from Wyoming was speaking.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It has been stricken out in the committee, but it is in the bill that was drafted, and in the bill which is made admissible here you will see the word "franchise."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from South Dakota for emphasizing the fact that the words "rights and franchise" are in the measure which we are considering, and as far as that is concerned it would not make a particle of difference whether you call them rights and franchises or some I assume that when a sovereign takes over the other name. right to do business, the sovereign must pay for the thing taken, and I do not think it makes any difference what you call it. If it is true that there is in the area over which our flag floats some intangible thing called government, separate from the people, that can take the property of the people without compensation, we have come to a bad pass in this Republic of ours. It does not matter whether it is the property of an undesirable citizen or a grasping corporation or of the holiest and best-meaning man that ever lived. Whoever it belongs to it has the same protection, and if it is taken it must be paid for. If I am wrong about that, then I have lived all these years in profound ignorance of the Government of which I am a citizen.

It follows, therefore, that it is proposed to take over this property, those rights and franchises, at a time when their earning value is the highest, and before that earning value has been decreased by the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission and legislation already reported by a committee of the House.

If I were an owner of express stock the proposed legislation would occur to me as being in the nature of a godsend. It is just exactly the thing which, in the present situation, with lower express rates inevitable in the near future and therefore reduced profits, the holders of express stock would be expected to profoundly pray for.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit another interruption there?

Mr. MONDELL. If I may have the time.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I interrupt just to say right upon this point that perhaps this committee ought to know that notice was given to the express companies to appear before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce if they desired to make any opposition to that measure, and a couple of days were named as days when they could come, and they have not at all appeared to oppose the measure.

Mr. LEWIS. And may I further interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.
Mr. LEWIS. Did the express companies appear to contest or be heard on the subject of the rate-regulation bill that was reported by the committee?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. That matter was not to my knowledge specifically called to the attention of the express companies, but the chairman of the committee said specifically as to this bill that they had been notified to appear, and for one I was not at all surprised that they did not appear to oppose it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, for years the people have been protesting against inordinate express rates. Placing the express companies under the Interstate Commerce Commission was the first step in the direction of affording relief. The coming order of the Interstate Commerce Commission reducing rates is the first definite realization of relief; and the bill re-cently reported out of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce brings nearer the day of the full realization of the people's hopes of lower rates. At this critical juncture for the express companies along comes the Democratic majority in the House proposing to save the companies and their stockholders from any loss by taking over their business and paying for it on the basis of the swollen profits which they have been receiving. It is not strange that no one connected with an express company has protested against this procedure. It strikes me as being exactly the thing which under the circumstances they would desire to have done.

Everbody knows that the people have made up their minds that they are going to have lower express rates and that they have made up their minds they are going to occupy part of the field now occupied by the express companies. If this is not what the express companies want, what do they want? Here is an opportunity to sell their property at its present earning value, and I challenge any lawyer in this House to combat the proposition that such will be the basis on which we will ultimately be compelled to pay for this property if we take it in the way proposed.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MONDELL. My time is limited. Mr. LEWIS. But the gentleman challenged any lawyer in the House

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has plenty of time in which to reply to that challenge.

Mr. LEWIS. And I have the law in my hand here, and that law challenges the gentleman's declaration.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman may have some theory upon which the Government—the sovereign—can confiscate property. If he has any such theory it is something that has not come out of the courts and is not written in the law books. It must be a part of the new nationalism.

Mr. BERGER. Oh, now, do not attack me.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman a believer in the new

Mr. BERGER. Oh, no; I thought the gentleman said social-

Mr. MONDELL. This is not socialism. No Socialist would think of going at a thing in this unbusinesslike way-grabbing at something without knowing what he was getting or how much he was going to pay for it, with the certainty that he would pay more than it was worth, and that when he got it he would have something that would be of questionable value.

NOT NECESSARY FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A PARCEL POST.

The first purpose named in the bill for the taking over of the express business of the country is "to promote the postal service," but I am at a loss to understand how the postal service of the country is to be promoted by the procedure proposed, at least in the way in which it is proposed. It is claimed that the taking over of the express business of the country is essential to the establishment of a parcel post. If that be true, it is strange that it has not been generally recognized by those who have been the most ardent advocates of parcel post. The fact is that, while a general parcel post would undoubtedly take much business from the express companies, it would still leave a very considerable and very important express business, which is, in fact, a fast freight business, in no wise connected with the carrying of such parcels as properly appertain to a parcel post. I can understand, however, how, with the probability of a parcel post before them, the effect of which would be to curtail their business in certain lines, the express companies might think that this was a good time to unload their property at good, fat prices on an unsuspecting public, as the measure proposes to allow them to do.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman has made the boldest sort of statement that the express companies desired this very kind of legislation and that it is just put in here at a time when they would desire it most.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think I have not said I knew they desired it. I said that if I owned express stock I would desire it. I do not own any. I have said that, looking at it from their selfish standpoint, in my opinion, this is exactly what the express companies would want, and I repeat it, and I would like to emphasize it, that I can not think of anything that would appeal to the express magnate more than this; that at the dawning of the day when the American people have provided for lower rates, when they are proposing to occupy a large portion of the field, we take over the property on the basis of its past swollen earning value. [Applause.] There is no getting away from that, that that is exactly the proposition before us.

There is another interesting feature of this matter. Not only have the express companies failed to put in an appearance in the hearings on legislation identical with that before us and have made no protest against it, but the railroad companies, who will be profoundly affected by the proposed legislation, have made no protest against it. The legislation proposes that the Government shall take over the contracts which the express companies now have with the railroads, under which the railroads receive very large sums. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] a few days ago stated on the floor of the House that the Government is now paying the railroads twice as much for postal service as the express companies are paying for the same kind of service. Is it not reasonable to suppose that the railroad companies are quite content to have the Government take over the express companies, with the expectation, based on experience, that they will get quite as much from the Government as from the express companies, and probably much more? I impugn no man's motives, and I never have in this House, and I never expect to do so, but this proposition, no matter how innocently presented, is a gold brick, a fraud, and could work in the interest of no one except the owners of express stock.

The taking over of the express companies of the country and the purchase of their property, rights, and franchises is not even necessary to the establishment of a Government express business. If the country was prepared for and desired to have that done the Government could embark upon a parcel-post enterprise extensive enough to involve the carrying of packages as high as 100 pounds or even heavier, without the expenditure of a dollar in the purchase of the property which the express companies own. I admit that such a plan or policy would largely infringe upon the business of the express companies; would largely reduce their profits; but if such a policy is deemed wise I am not so solicitous of the welfare of the express companies that I feel called upon to vote the money of the people and their credit to an extent and in an amount which no man can even approximately guess in order to save them from possible loss.

How many millions or hundreds of millions is this condemnation and appropriation to cost? Does anybody know?

Will it cost fifty millions or a hundred or a hundred and fifty million dollars, and when will we know how much it will cost? How long will it take the courts to decide what must be paid for these properties, rights, and franchises? There is one consoling thought that may occur to the advocates of this blind experiment of unknown cost, and that is that they will probably be called hence long before it was finally decided how much the people must pay, and thus escape personal condem-

The estimates of cost that have been made by gentlemen in favor of this bill are ridiculous. Stop for a moment and figure on even the lowest basis of capitalization the enormous profits that the express companies have been making for years, and then talk about taking over the property of the express companies for a paltry $40,000,000 or $50,000,000. Unless the courts of the country took a view of this matter they have never taken, when like questions were involved, the cost would run into the hundreds of millions, and after we paid it we have, in addition to a lot of old junk, a right to do business which we have without paying anybody a red cent for it. [Applause.]

When it is done, if it is done, what assurance have we that the benefits will balance or outweigh the disadvantages? How do we know that we will get any better service or any cheaper service than can be had under the strict regulation of rates which we are now inaugurating?

For one I decline to accept the responsibility of joining in a proposition to pull the express companies out of the hole which they conceive strict regulation, reduction of rates, and the probable establishment of a general parcel post will put them into. I decline to sanction the inauguration of a questionable policy of centralization involving serious legal as well as political problems, and vastly increasing the army of Federal employees, which the people have not generally considered and to which they have never given their sanction. The policy is questionable, to say the least; the plan proposed is most extravagant and should not be adopted, even if the policy contemplated were advisable.

RENT FOR HIGHWAYS.

Perhaps the most picturesque proposal that has ever been seriously presented to Congress is contained in the provision contained in the amendment which contemplates the payment by the National Government of a rental for the use of the highways over which the rural mails are carried.

In brief, the plan is that the Government shall pay-to whom is not stated-from $15 to $25 per mile per annum for all roads of certain classes or character over which the rural mails are carried.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield me about 10 or 15 minutes additional?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I yield 15 minutes to the gen-

Mr. MONDELL. This measure is confidently expected to appeal strongly to the rural population and, it is hoped, will sustain the waning political fortunes of those from the country districts who favor it. Perhaps if I were situated as some gentlemen are my judgment, like theirs, would be somewhat affected by the political exigencies of my situation; fortunately for me I can look at the matter uninfluenced by the importunings of the folks at home who hope to benefit by this extraordinary and unique raid upon the Federal Treasury.

There are only 10 rural free-delivery routes, covering 287 miles, in the State I have the honor to represent, and if we received the maximum for all of them we would receive but $7,075 in our State out of a total outlay in the country for this purpose of many millions of dollars. The fact is, however, that none of our rural free-delivery mileage would come under class A at $25 per mile rent for shell, brick, or macadam roads. I doubt if any of it would come under class D at $20 per mile for burnt clay, gravel, or clay and gravel, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel roads. Perhaps half our rural roads might come under a liberal interpretation of class C, or good, well-drained, and well-kept dirt roads, at $15 per mile, so that, in fact, we might receive $2,145 out of possible millions for the entire country.

I make this statement in order that I may not lay claim to superior courage or virtue when I vote against this measure, as 95 per cent of all those here would do if they counseled with their judgment rather than their fear or hope of political advantage.

Furthermore, I have no automobile factories in my district and am therefore free from the influence of the gentlemen who desire that Uncle Sam shall contribute to boom their business by building and repairing highways.

If we are going into the business of taxing Uncle Sam for sending his mail wagons over our highways, once a day, a sum equal to the entire cost of their upkeep and more, I think we should, in order to be consistent, charge him for every use of our highways by his agents. Down in the moonshining districts it would be highly popular to tax Uncle Sam for the use of the highways by the deputy marshals. [Laughter.] Out our way, if we are to inaugurate this policy, it would be a popular measure to tax the Government for the use of our highways by special agents of the Land Office. [Laughter.] In fact, I know of no other way in which we could secure our share of Federal [Laughter.]

The gentleman who is, I believe, primarily responsible for this plan calls himself, I understand, a Jeffersonian Democrat. I wonder what the patron saint of Democracy would say to such a measure of centralization! Shadow of Thomas Jefferson, with his clear perception of the dividing line between the powers and responsibilities and jurisdiction, respectively, of the Federal Government and the sovereign States! Has it come to be a principle of Jeffersonian Democracy to look upon the Federal Treasury as fair plunder for every one who can get his hand into it with a view of scattering its dollars among his constituents?

It is true that we have done many things which have tended to encourage the view that the Federal Treasury is a myste- absence for five days on account of important business.

rious source of wealth as unfailing as the waters that followed the smiting of the rock in the wilderness. We have dredged insignificant brooks, we have deepened lonesome harbors, we have protected private property along the rivers from inundation, until it is not strange that some gentlemen here who have participated in these things, and their constituents who have enjoyed and profited by the outlay, have come to look upon Uncle Sam as a sort of glorified Santa Claus who celebrates Christmas every day in the year.

Mr. DUPRE. How about irrigation?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman evidently was not in the Chamber when I explained that the Federal Government has never given the western farmer a penny under the Federal irrigation law; that every dollar expended is to be returned, and it is rapidly being returned at this time, and will continue to be returned by the hard-working farmers of the West. [Applause.]

I think this is the first time, however, it has been seriously proposed to adopt the tactics of the highwayman and hold up our generous and indulgent Government in the road. is the more reprehensible in that it is proposed to sandbag the Government in connection with the performance of a real and valuable service to the people in the delivery of the mails.

It is useless to talk to the other side of the aisle, at least, as to the centralizing tendency of this legislation-local self-government, local responsibility, local control, all these things which constitute the real substance of a proper and legitimate doctrine of State rights, are subjects over which, in theory, the gentlemen grow eloquent in discussion, but which vanish from sight and recollection in the presence of the all-pursuading influence of a Federal appropriation. With a few honorable exceptions there is not a gentleman on the other side of the aisle who can not adjust every conviction he ever had on the subject of local versus Federal control to meet any proposition that involves liberal Federal expenditure in his district. That there still remains even a frayed remnant of the distinction between the proper jurisdiction and proper field of expenditure of the State and National Governments, respectively, in any field where a Federal appropriation might be hoped for, is entirely due to the influence of this side of the House.

The gentleman from New York smiles, and I am glad to tes-fy to the helpful influence of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who is not addicted to, navy yards excepted, chasing Federal appropriations as much as some of his colleagues, particularly the gentleman who stands near him. [Laughter.]

The Commonwealth which I have the honor to represent on this floor does not desire and does not expect to turn over any of its police powers to the Federal Government. It intends to retain its highways under its own exclusive jurisdiction, and as it does not anticipate that anyone will permanently contribute largely to its highways, without having some directly or indirectly in their control, it does not desire to invite Federal control by accepting the Federal shilling. Neither are our people so lacking in a sense of humor, or so lost to the sense of honor, as to become party to a plan which proposes to fine the Federal Government for undertaking to afford its people mail facilities. We have sufficient difficulty now in securing such facilities without still further jeopardizing our chances in that direction, because the Federal Government is spending its millions elsewhere in paying the States for the privilege of giving their people first-class mail facilities.

In the West the Government still retains ownership over large areas reserved for public purposes, areas untaxed and yielding no returns to the States. We believe the Federal Government should do its duty in building roads over these areas, but the highways of our Commonwealth are our trust and our responsibility. We have no patience with any plan which would make their construction and maintenance a matter of national responsibility, and least of all do we approve a scheme which, in the guise of charging an inordinate rent for the use of roads, is just a plain, barefaced looting of the Public Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21279, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. Borland was granted leave of CONFERENCE REPORT, DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill (H. R. 19212).

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not call up that conference report to-night.

Mr. SULZER. I do not know that there is any objection to the report. It is unanimous.

Mr. MANN. There are one or two things in it I wish to call to the attention of the gentleman. It is quite late, and we have not very many people here.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, in view of what the gentleman says I shall not insist, but will call it up to-morrow morning.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate further insists upon its amendment to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below: S. 3846. An act to authorize a waiver of trial by jury in the district courts of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 3607. An act to direct the Attorney General to take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from a decree entered by the Circuit Court of the United States in and for the Southern District of New York in the suit of the United States against the American Tobacco Co. and others, and extend the time for taking such appeal, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiclary. S. 3116. An act to amend sections 1 and 2 of the act of Congress of June 22, 1910, entitled "An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands," so as to include State land selections, indemnity, school, and educational lands; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 836. An act for the relief of Joel J. Parker; to the Committee on Claims.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 18336. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

CLASSIFICATION AND APPRAISEMENT OF UNALLOTTED INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 405, and ask that the House insist on its amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. MANN. Where is the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is on the Speaker's table. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

 Λ bill (S. 405) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to classify and appraise unallotted Indian lands.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House insist on its amendment and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House insist on its amendment and agree to a conference.

Mr. MANN. What is the amendment, I will ask?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "reservation," insert the word "here-tofore."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The intention is to make it so that it will apply to reservations heretofore opened as well as hereafter to be opened.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Stephens] moves that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. STE-PHENS of Texas, Mr. FERRIS, and Mr. Burke of South Dakota.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken upon the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 21279) may have leave to extend their remarks, and those who desire to do so may print remarks in the Record for five legislative days after the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] asks unanimous consent that those who have spoken on the Post Office appropriation bill shall have permission to extend their remarks in the Record, and those who have not spoken shall have the privilege of printing speeches or remarks in the Record for five legislative days after the bill passes the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the first part of the request. I may not object to the other when it is submitted after the bill is disposed of.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will say there are a number of gentlemen who wish to print their remarks in the Record, but they desire to go away for a few days and they would like to know what can be done along that line before they leave. I supposed there would be no objection to the printing if they desired it.

Mr. MANN. This is general leave?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has submitted two propositions—one for general leave to print and one to extend remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. POWERS. Does the gentleman object to extending the time to 10 days instead of 5?
Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think five days after the disposition of the bill is long enough. It is on matters contained in the bill.

Mr. M Λ NN. Reserving the right to object, what is the gentleman's purpose in reference to the general debate on the bill now?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am going to ask the consent of the House in a minute that we take a recess until to-morrow at 10.30 o'clock a. m., and I hope that we will be enabled by 10.30 at night, if we continue debate that long, to close general debate.

Mr. MANN. If we take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Ten-thirty o'clock.

Mr. MANN. Would general debate take the entire day tomorrow?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think it would; perhaps up to 10.30 to-morrow night. Then we could go into debate of the bill under the five-minute rule Thursday and have a liberal debate, as to time, on the bill Thursday, and Saturday at the latest we ought to have a vote on the bill.

Mr. MANN. I am very much interested in reasonable debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That would give us two days' debate under the five-minute rule, practically.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] as to the printing of speeches?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until 10.30 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, April 24, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:
